Dhl signature release text message

Texting has become such an integral part of how we communicate that we often don't think twice about the types of messages we send. Whether it's sending a quick emoji, or describing your day in its entirety, texting is usually our go-to form of reaching out to others. However, there are some things not to say about text, no matter how convenient or easy they seem. Texting etiquette has shifted over time, but there are still certain conversations worth having in person and rules you should follow to make sure you don't hurt yourself or others. Texting etiquette is becoming more important than ever now in today's mobile-first culture, lifestyle coach Jaya Jaya Myra tells Bustle. How and when you text someone will certainly affect how they feel about you, and even how they choose to interact with you. From business, to family, to relationships, you'll be texting at some point, so it's best to know the right etiquette for all these different scenarios. A big part of cultivating good relationships with people is communication, and this includes how you act on your cell phone. Sometimes that comes down to losing the phone altogether and opting for a personal discussion. To make sure you don't upset someone, or potentially even hurt yourself, here are 13 things to watch out for. 1Tell someone bad news about your health Although it may be tempting to avoid a conversation, it's never a good idea to convey bad health news about a text, says Myra. It doesn't give the person the chance to fully process the information, and it may seem like you don't care about their feelings. As hard as it is, you make the best time for a real conversation when it comes to news about your well-being. This should not come as a surprise, but avoid ending a relationship with someone in a text. It took a lot to maintain a relationship, says Myra. If you want things to end on amicable terms, never break over text. Have the conversation face-to-face as long as the relationship is not toxic or offensive and it is safe to do so. This way, your partner can heal well. 3Bring Up An Old ArgumentAlthough you generally have to stay away from intentionally dragging old problems, doing it over text especially is a big no-no. Not only do you stir dirt, you do it in a passive aggressive way that prevents someone from reacting in a meaningful way, says Myra. Things get misunderstood about text all the time because there is no tone of voice or body language to measure, making a text the worst possible way to bring an old problem. Sending a password may seem harmless, but it can be very easy in wrong hands fall. You never really know who sees someone's phone or scrolls through someone's texts, so it's never a good idea to send passwords via text message, says Myra. A phone is also much easier then hack than you might think, making everything you send via text vulnerable to stealing. And let's not forget that people lose their phones and in some cases let them steal. 5Send Unsolicited sexual photosYly want to make sure the person on the receiving end is OK with what you send, especially if it's sexual in nature. Unwanted sexual advances happen far too often, Tara Struyk, co-founder and editor-in-chief of Kinkyly tells Bustle. This can include unsolicited nude photos, unjustified sexts, and progress with sexual conversations and requests when the person has shown no interest. Whether you're texting or talking in person, the rules are the same: Be respectful, be aware of other people's boundaries and find out if someone is receptive to your advances before you make them, says Struyk.6Complain About Your WorkplaceEveryone should sometimes vent about their work, but be wary of expressing your negative feelings in a text message, especially against a colleague. Friends (especially colleagues) can quickly become enemies, and your job could be compromised if those texts are shared with the wrong people, family internet safety lawyer Sue Scheff tells Bustle. If you have a bad day at work, consider working with your friend or fellow off-tech for a session of whining and wine - no appliances. Hearing that someone has passed never feels right, but when you announce it through the text, you have no idea where that person is or what they do when they receive it. This situation should be handled delicately and not by text message, etiquette expert Jacquelyn Youst tells Bustle. You run the risk of coming across as cold and indifferent. 8Handle Job-Related ProblemsIt's nerve-wracking to confront a colleague or your boss with a problem you have, but hiding behind your phone is not the way to go. Treat work-related problems personally, says Youst. You don't want to burn bridges in your career. Sometimes it's hard to ignore the instinct to text your group chat about the outrageous news you've just heard, but you'll want to refrain from spreading information about others that are so easily spread across text. This is never a good idea, because it's too easy to take a screenshot or send a message to everyone, says Myra. The last thing you want is hardcore evidence of your negative gossip to get back to the wrong people. Business negotiations are a subtle and delicate thing, and not suitable for text messages, says Myra. Face-to-face interactions are needed to build trust and trust, and you won't be able to do this in a text. In fact, texting about business things will make you look very unprofessional. Instead a face-to-face conversation, and then finalize what you've discussed in a written contract. Telling someone you're pregnant is a big deal - whether it's announcing it to the dad or even just spreading it news to family and friends. Delivering news about a new baby needs to be handled in person, says Youst. Take the opportunity to spread the good news in person, and show joy with words and body language. 12Say I Love You For The First TimeKaspars Grinvalds/FotoliaSaying you love someone for the first time is a big moment, and you don't have to underplay it. You are never taken seriously when you convey something full of emotion and feeling through an emotionless text, says Myra. Use a personal conversation to convey the depth of your emotion and discuss it openly with your partner. There is nothing more nerve-racking than waiting for a response to such a text. If you want to make it right, apologize personally, admit you're doing wrong and have a useful plan to make it right, says Myra. Everyone relates to excuses differently and needs different things to feel that the apology is sincere. The only consistent thing is that you never get that feeling out of your partner when you try to apologize in a text. In fact, your apparent lack of attention and sincerity is appropriate to make your problem worse. Texting is one of the easiest ways to communicate, and is certainly effective for lighter conversations. But save the heavier subjects in person - some things were just meant to be said face-to-face. Corbis I'm probably the last person on the planet who doesn't send text messages from my cell phone. What am I missing? Communicate you spontaneously while you're on the go. Since the message is typed, there are no ringing phones to disturb others. And like an email, texting requires no immediate response. Text messages are short, concise and don't waste anyone's time. They give you a written record, so they're great for things like directions, addresses and instructions. But no one uses text messages to send long messages. How do you send a text? With most mobile phones, there is an option in the main menu with features to create and receive messages. You type in the recipient's phone number and then the message, which you do in two ways. The old way, called multi-tap, is to use the letters on your keyboard numbers. But that can be awkward and slow. Most phones offer a much faster method, usually called T9, or predictive text. That system finds out what word you meant, based on past use and context. In short, a vocabulary of commonly used words and terms is loaded into the system, and it pulls out of that every time. What's with the language? Text messages look like secret code. The maximum you write in a text message is usually 160 characters, which is just a sentence or two. So acronyms developed as a steno-lol for laughing out loud, brb for his right back. A lot of it is phonetic, combining numbers and letters like c u 2morrow for you see you And because it's hard to produce punctuation, you get run-on sentences, no apostrophes, no contractions. What's the etiquette for texting? There isn't one. With the limited amount of space and the difficulty of typing something except letters and numbers, social graces are the first to go. There are no saluting or sign-offs. Texting is very direct- that's part of his cool chic. How does texting work to vote or buy something? In most cases, the company will give you a five-digit number, the address you will use instead of a phone number. The other approach, which is used on American Idol, must assign each participant a text address. You type the address, press send and that's your voice. Texting is also used more commercially. You send a company a text message and they send you a coupon code or an advertising blurb back. Are there any decent texts? To receive local listings, text Google by typing 466453 as an address. For example, type in the body pizza and your zip code and they'll text you right back with the nearest pizza place, address and phone number. It's a free service, which is great. You also get movie times, flight arrivals, even glossary terms and French translations. How much does texting cost? It generally costs ten cents to send and receive messages. Whether you get an unlimited subscription and pay a fixed fee every month - that's what people with teens usually do. What are ten terms I need to know to start texting? These are useful: are you - are you....? you - see you rn - now l8r - later yr - your g2g - got to go hv - have mtf - more to follow ttyl - talk to you later ttfn - ta-ta for now And now you can House Beautiful for your cell phone!
