The apple 1980

At the bottom of the screen. There's little thought — or so it seems — around how advertising is served. Just churn and bern'm. While I've been a Google Bull historically, I'm not sure how much longer I can hang with what I perceive as a lack of focus and innovative forward speed. This type of approach of Microsoft (MSFT) smacks — get report judgment to drop $8.5 billion like Skype. I understand why Microsoft took this step. This is becoming all the more obvious as we get a peek at Windows 8. But as fast as I'm doing at Microsoft these days, I wonder if there was a better way to compete in space. The same strategy that often backfires on game teams appears in play in companies like Google and Microsoft. We are big and we can get even bigger by spending money on acquisitions. The bigger we become, the more income we can generate. At some point this approach runs a high risk of diversity. I prefer apple models. Create amazing products and then do one of two things to deliver content: build the platform or partner with companies capable of delivering at a higher level. No good reason exists for Apple to spend billions of dollars to do something it can find for very little through an in-house effort or external collaboration. Google and Apple's different business models line up not to fly here. They really don't. Both companies earn platforms, content, what you have. Google leverages these things for advertising revenue, while Apple does hardware for sale. Google takes if we build it really, really big by assembling 8,0 different moving parts, they will come to approach. Apple leans and runs mean, banking on quality, not quantity, to drive huge results. The author was a long MSFT at the time of publication. To follow @RoccoPendola at the time of publication, the author had long MSFT. MSFT.
