Advanced Biomedicine Computer Science (ABCS) is part of the Biomedicine Informatics and Data Science (BIDS) program and supports scientific research at the Frederick National Laboratory for Cancer Research (FNLCR), NCI in Frederick, NCI in Bethesda, NIH and other federal agencies. ABCS provides bioinformatics, mathematical simulation and modeling, image analysis and visualization, chemoinformatics, proteomic analysis, data integration support for scientific projects through database maintenance and development, and development of scientific web applications. Recording and visualization, Yanling Liu Imaging and Visualization Group (IVG) supports and accelerates basic research by developing and implementing technologies in image analysis, scientific visualization, IT and software infrastructure; and services to facilitate access to data, cooperation and re-cooperation; reduce double efforts; and automate work-intensive workflows. Specific examples include 3D electron microscopy (EM)/light microscopy (LM) image volume registration and real-time visualization based on the web. ABCS provides innovative solutions in a wide range of structure analysis and support tools to accelerate the engineering and structural characterization of advanced materials, and macromolecules, including modeling. Implementation of hybrid methods (xray, EM, SAXS/SANS), tool development and customized workflows and services Mathematical and Statistical Analysis, Brian Luke and Randy Johnson Mathematical and Statistical Analytical Group provides mathematical and statistical analysis and modeling of cancer and HIV/AIDS, including: computer simulations, regression analysis, survival analysis, consultation with study design and parallelization/optimization of analytical scripts The Data Solutions and Systems Biology Group (DSSB) aims to simplify and provide integrative and innovative solutions to the NCI/NIH community to access and use biological information collected in various sources and formats. The group focuses on the integration of different data sources to enable agnostic access and disease analysis, impact variants, species-to-species identifier conversions and merger of clinical and research data. DSSB also provides scientific infrastructure, informatics management and web programming support. A scientific web program group, THE ABCS Science Web Program Group (SWPG) enables and supports NCI science by providing innovative web application and tool development to help groups and researchers manage and track data and interact with data and scientific applications through web interfaces. The Scientific Information Management Group (SIM) provides support for simplifying scientific workflows. The Group provides data management, analysis and automation support for NCI/NIH researchers. In addition, the group is working on development and maintenance of applications. ABCS provides a range of core resources to NCI and NIAID investigators. CCBR/NCBR are resources to provide a wide range of CCR/NIAID PI bioinformatics expertise to PI's and scientists. The possibilities of analysis cover a wide range of issues in biomedical research, from basic biology to clinical applications. Typical requirements include the processing, analysis and interpretation of high-dimensional datasets generated by microarray, Exome-seq, RNA-Seq, CHIP-seq, metagenomics and mass spectrometry platforms, as well as publicly available data. CCR-SF specializes in data analysis and quality control of NGS, consulting on sequencing technology, research/evaluation of new technologies, and data analysis and management. These core groups work closely together, and projects often involve multiple groups. Computational chemistry and quantum calculations, Joe Ivanić ABCS maintains expertise in computer chemistry. In particular, expertise in quantum chemistry and drug design, small molecule properties derived from high quantum chemical calculations, and the development of algorithms and software for GAMESS. Content created by Immediate Office of the Secretary (IOS)Content last reviewed on April 26, 2017 Disappointment and frustration become regular companions to many people with psoriasis, a chronic skin disease that can be repeated with seemingly no rhyme or reason. The scary thing about psoriasis is that it's capricious... he often does whatever he wants, whenever he wants. Although life stress is a familiar trigger, it sometimes flares up for no damn reason, says dermatologist and clinical psychologist Richard Fried, PhD, from Yardley, PA. Studies have shown that people living in unpredictable circumstances that cannot be controlled become angry, depressed and anxious. To give patients a sense of hope and control over their lives, Fried provides specific tools that combine traditional and complementary medications, including deep breathing exercises, self-misunderstanding, muscle relaxation, hypnosis, yoga, tai chi and biofeedback training. We find more concrete evidence that using mind/body interventions not only makes people feel better, but makes their biology respond better, Fried says. For example, in a study of psoriasis patients undergoing ultraviolet light treatment, people who combined treatment with listening to conscious meditation tape reduced the amount of ultraviolet radiation needed to clear psoriasis by 50%. Nevertheless, one catch on any psoriasis treatment is that what works for one person will not necessarily work for another. For Toni Ann Little, lymphatic massage helped ease both psoriasis and psoriatic arthritis at several different points in her life. She turned to lymphatic massage not only because she felt fine, but also because she found solace in having a therapist touch her wounds and inflict a full one. It means anything that someone will touch you as if there were it's wrong with you, says Little. Human touch, as well as accepting the condition, is so important that Fried offers his patients a 15-minute audiotape for visualization. Using guided images, they are directed to imagine their hand as sunlight and then touch their psoriasis. Finding what works for you Genetic autoimmune disease, psoriasis causes the body to send faulty signals to the skin, which then grows every 3 to 5 days, not the normal 30 days. Unable to undress quickly enough, the skin piles up and becomes inflamed and covered with white flakes that can cause it to go crazy. I'm always itchy, and I'm grumpier than most people, says Leslie Kronish, first diagnosed at the age of 10. She deals with the discomfort of her psoriasis in one of two ways. One is total denial, where I try to forget him. The other is so aware of it that it's very distracting, and pain and itching, and I try to brush it off [white flakes] while it falls so it's not on my shoulders and pants, she says. She also practices deep breathing to curb stress, a technique that helps her find some inner calm. MORE: 7 Things Your Skin Tries to Tell You, but Ultimately, Kronish Feels She's in a Chicken and Egg Situation When It Comes to Managing Her Psoriasis. I'm not sure if stress and anxiety make the situation worse, or the fact that it's getting harder creates stress and anxiety. It's a dilemma doctors are also trying to figure out. Dermatologists increasingly appreciate the idea that skin disease like psoriasis is a two-month pathway: It causes emotional stress, and emotional stress can exacerbate psoriasis, says Fried, who creates a comprehensive treatment plan to help reduce a patient's stress and stress levels. Tai chi is one of the methods some use to relieve stress. This gentle martial art quiets the mind and calms the body. When the mind is silent, the body will follow, says Troyce Thome, who teaches yoga and tai chi at Saddleback College, Mission Viejo, CA. Thome, a former head coach of the Arthritis Foundation's Tai Chi arthritis program - roughly 10 to 30% of people with psoriasis develop psoriatic arthritis - has occasionally experienced mild psoriasis diseases since their 20s. She believes, however, that tai chi, which she has practiced for more than 14 years, may be keeping the disease at bay. (Interested? See how you can get started.) Dietary changes are another way in which some psoriasis sufferers try to control the disease. One detailed regimen called the Pagano Diet focuses on six principles: internal cleansing, proper nutrition, herbal teas, spinal adjustments, external fats and thinking that focuses on the treatment of psoriasis. Deirdre Earls, who was a registered dietitian for 5 years, took matters into her own hands by devising her own diet based on macrobiotic cuisine, which now teaches others with psoriasis. In July 2002, he was sentenced to 10 years in When I was driving the car, I had to use my fingertips because I couldn't get to the steering wheel, he says. Suffering from psoriasis from the age of 13. Any inconvenience Earls experienced was worth it, she says: Since I changed, I haven't taken a single prescription drug for my psoriasis, and my skin has all over my body cleansed by 90%.
