Case of the missing guitar worksheet answers

01/03/2020 Strange Story! Sometime in 2014-15, my friend Mark wants to sell me this very nice guitar. It's a hypocrite, and I'm not sure I should do it, but Mark really needed the money so he could do something very nice to his family, so I pull the trigger. I pickit it up from him later that year at the festival. Over the years, a creeping dark feeling began to settle down with me. Is the guitar you bought still the guitar I have? Whenever I get to talk instruments with people, I'd put up my little guitar story here, because it's among the nicest instruments I have. It was made by Dennis Overton, who seems to be an upscale maker who no longer builds it's dreadnought-martins herring. It's Brazilian Rosewood direct-grained, which was rare even in the 60's and is completely banned from international shipments now. I think it's like a turtle chooses a shell in this way. What is with guitar people and illegal stuff? Anyway, that's a lot I know about guitar. But I was looking at the guitar on my wall, right on his head: YAMAHA. The poster inside the body? Yamaha. By the time I was having this feeling, I've had it for many years, I can't really remember all the finedetails of the guitar I bought, let alone exactly what it looked like the day I bought it. Yamaha makes some damn acoustic guitars very pretty, even sometimes with guest makers. Maybe this was just based on the basic shape, feel, and (I hate to say it) so the sound, I always assumed this guitar on my wall is the one I bought. Until this feeling continued to creep further and further into my brain. I even mentioned YAMAHA on his head to Mark once, but it was only in passing, and I remember giving him a strange smile like he assumed I was joking, and I didn't take it any further. So just a few days ago, I get up the balls to take a picture of the guitar on my wall and send it to Mark and just see if this is the right guitar or not. I hesitated for a long time because it was embarrassing. How can I not even know? Get this text (see screenshot from iMessage). Welbe, here it is. The nice guitar, which I bought for $5, 000, is gone. I haven't realized that yet. How long exactly has it been? Well, you're able to do a little light detective work thanks to Google Photos. There must be fancy machine learning things built into Google Photos so that you can search for things and they'll find pictures of that stuff. Guitar also works great search! So eventually I find pictures from mid-2016 where I have the right guitar, and by mid-2017 I have the wrong guitar. 2016: True Guitar 2017: The wrong guitar my mind was reeling with thoughts about someone who stole it. Maybe at a festival or jam. I was looking the other way and they were exchanging guitars, maybe inside the case. I walk away and by the time I notice, they to have gone a long time ago. They'll be smart too, because apparently I'm the kind of person who hasn't noticed for years. I remember my little sad story for my wife, including this time frame, and it's like we've been in Miami over a lot of that time. i should see if Andrea has. Andrea is our friend and was our next-door neighbor in Miami, who had a very acoustic guitar and both guitars travel every now and then back and forth between houses. We have whatsapp shared, so I message girls and see if they will send a picture of their guitar... Look at that vertical wealth, Dr. Overton. That's it! You've turned guitars with Andrea! No crimes! None of us realized what happened all this time I still feel like a fool for not realizing for a long time frankly, those small $150 Yamaha looks pretty good if you ask me but I'm so glad the puzzle has been solved and very much looking forward to getting the guitar I bought back. We haven't arranged it yet, but I think it's going to be a hand-held escort from Miami to Bend! This piano, acoustic and guitar (melody right) music sheet was originally published in Key E/Composers of this song: Lyrics and Music by Joshua P. Thompson, TIM Kelly, BOB Robinson and Joe Thomas.
