This kind of compensa... Question: What is a divorce? People have a lot of questions about divorce, what it is, how to proceed with divorce and so on. Therefore, I try to answer some of the most common questions people seem to have when faced with divorce. Divorce is a legal move between married people to break off their maritirre relationship. It can be invoked as a divorce and is basically a legal action that ends the marriage before the death of both spouses. Answer: What is a fail-free divorce? Error-free laws have taken away the need to look for a bug. The Divorce Act allows either party to sue for divorce and only to sue in incompatible differences. Born of these laws was the concept of unilateral divorce: both partners feeling the urge to end a marriage they can do and leave free. What is separation? Separation is like a divorce. This involves the same process of filing papers with the court to begin a legal action, and the court making the same decisions about children, debts and assets as divorce. At the end of the process, however, the parties are legally separated rather than divorced. That means they're still married, but they're not responsible for each other. What happens in divorce? The purpose of divorce is to terminate the marriage of the parties. To this end, the parties and the court must decide how to deal with custody and custody issues of minor children and how to share the parties' assets and debts. State law presupposes that both parties are entitled to half of the marital property and that both parties are responsible for half of the spousal debts. Extramarital property is a property inherited by one of the parties or inherited by a third party only property and, if it was kept in isolation, would remain with that person after the divorce. What is marital property? All total spouses of the parties, unless otherwise specified. Things like pensions, bank accounts, stocks and bonds, even if they're only held on behalf of one party. The property entered into the marriage is still conjugal, although depending on the duration of the marriage and the nature of the property, the court may decide to return it to the party who had it before the marriage. The courts try to be fair to both parties and both parties are responsible for the court and the other party fully disclosing all assets and debts. What about spousal support? Depending on the duration of the marriage, the age and state of health of the parties, as well as the parties' ability to earn income and the maintenance of the marital standard of living, the court may order spousal support paid by one spouse to the other. It's a different matter than child support. Maintenance may be limited or indefinite, depending on the circumstances. It may be reviewed if there is a significant change in the circumstances of any former spouse. Do I need a lawyer to get a divorce? Individuals always have the opportunity to represent themselves in a court proceeding. If so, the pro se will continue to litire. However, if you have any serious issues with your children, property, debts or spousal support, it is better to have the help of a lawyer. The lawyer can only represent one of the two. On Monday, Channing Tatum and Jenna Dewan Tatum broke some very surprising news: Their favorite adorable (not to mention absurdly gay) famous couple separating after nine years of marriage. In keeping with the lovable nature of the partnership, Channing and Jenna simultaneously released a joint statement via People and social media accounts. We have lovingly decided to separate as a couple, the statement reads. It feels strange that we have to share this with everyone, but it is a consequence of the life we have chosen and for which we are also very grateful, the statement reads. This content is imported from Instagram. You may find the same content in a different format, or you may find more information on your site. Channing and Jenna also expressed their want to clarify things about why their relationship ended: Absolutely nothing has changed about how much we love each other, but love is a beautiful adventure that now takes us down different paths. There are no secrets or racy events at the root of our decision – just two best friends realizing that it's time to take some space and help each other live the funst, full life possible. We're still a family, and we're always going to be loving, committed parents to Everly. We will not comment beyond this and thank you all in advance for respecting Privacy. As sad as it is that all relationships are over, it's no super surprising that Channing and Jenna managed to handle news of their separation from maturity and kindness (after all, their relationship always seemed genuinely loving). And as awkward as it seems to announce a breakup on social media, this kind of thing is pretty common place for high-profile couples. Who can forget the conscious separation of Gwyneth Paltrow and Chris Martin in 2014, announced on the Gwyneth website GOOP? Rapper Logic announced his divorce from Jessica Andrea in an equally relaxed Twitter statement in March. It's very simple: It just didn't work out,' she wrote. There's no hard feelings. No fighting, no cheating, nothing. We love each other, and we're going to support each other for the rest of our lives. For those who don't have a fan base or tabloid reporters demanding a response, a social media statement is probably not necessary. But for couples who are splitting up and wondering how to tell their friends and family, it wouldn't hurt to take a page from Channing and Jenna's book: 1. Don't do anyone's faultAlways it's best to go about it so that a person isn't at fault or claims to be one responsible for the breakup, says Bruce Berman, Ph.D., a private practice psychologist who works with dire couples and families in New York. Maybe one person wanted to see the relationship continue and the other partner didn't, Berman continues. But if the relationship doesn't work, usually because both partners have contributed to the relationship it doesn't work in some way. I therefore believe that if they can present it in a way that does not fall solely on one of the partners, it is constructive. A decision to divorce or separate is probably one you're making as a couple, Berman adds, so if at all possible, decisions about how you're going to break the news are collaborative. 2. Work as a team to break the news The best way for couples who are separating or parting is to tell friends and family to first sit down together and figure out how they want to go about doing what they want to say and who want to say first, Berman notes, adding that splitting pairs tends to be a mountain of issues (like custody agreements and alimony) to settle together before they are separated from relationships. It may make sense to have a united front when you tell certain people and delegate certain friends or relatives to one party or the other. The separation, as a couple, still has something to do together, Berman says. Assuming there is no prohibitively high level of hostility between the two of you, of course.3. Consider the best option for kids This content is imported from Instagram. The same content may be used in a different format. information on their website. For couples with children like Jenna and Channing's case, maintaining a level of civility and support is essential, says William J. Ryan, Ph.D., a private practice psychologist in Brooklyn, New York. If children are involved, they are co-parenting with this person for life, she says. You want the family to continue to function as a family system. This can set the tone for future interactions down the track, which includes everything from collaboration during parent-teacher conferences to civilians at the child's wedding years later. Ryan and Berman agree that when informing children of separation, parents should avoid laying blame, demonizing, or bad-mouthed each other. 4. If you have doubts about making room for each other While separating best practices may seem simple enough for many couples, it's easier said than done. Many people who find themselves filing for divorce don't feel so kind and loving toward their former partners like Jenna and Channing.For those couples, it's probably best to just share and conquer: Tell people in your own time, in any way you feel most natural for you. But if you have kids, don't tweet or share big divorce news until your child is aware and understands the situation. Chances are, the kid's probably an active online presence.
