For example, $225K would be understood as $225,000, and $3.6K would be understood as $3,600. Multiple K's are not commonly used to represent larger numbers. In other words, it would be odd to use $1.2KK to represent $1,200,000. Ke – used as an abbreviation for equity costs (COE). Ke is a risk-adjusted, theoretical rate of return on the company's invested excess capital raised through external investments. Among other things, the value of Ke and the cost of debt (COD)[6] allows management to decide on different forms of short- and long-term financing of different types of expenditure. When it is most prominently related to companies that generally generate surplus capital (free cash flow, cash on hand) from ongoing operations. Critically, when assessing the financial situation of a company (and reading its balance sheet), COE differs from CAPEX or the cost of capital expenditure. [7] [8] When most commonly used in the Capital Asset Valuation Model (CAPM), in which Ke = Rf + β (Rm-Rf). In this equation, Ke (COE) is equal to the expected yield on difference (Beta) yields on yields based on market expectations (Rm)[9] and risk-free rate (Rf), such as Treasury bills or bonds. When it is most prominently related to companies that generally generate surplus capital (free cash flow, cash on hand) from ongoing operations. Critically, when assessing the financial situation of a company (and reading its balance sheet), COE differs from CAPEX or the cost of capital expenditure. [7] [8] When most commonly used in the Capital Asset Valuation Model (CAPM), in which Ke = Rf + β (Rm-Rf).
