She was the first of two daughters born to Arthur H. Keller, a Confederate Army officer during the Civil War and Katherine Adams Keller. The family's income came from the cotton plantation and later from her father's work as editor of the Northern Albanian newspaper. Young Helen, who was born with her sense of sight and hearing, began speaking at 6 months and began walking at the age of 1. However, Keller contracted the disease called brain fever by the family doctor. It generated a high body temperature in 1882. Some experts believe it could have been second or meningitis. At 19 months, Helen lost her sense of sight and hearing. Helen's mother noticed a change with her daughter when she showed no reaction when the dinner bell rang, or when a hand waved in front of her face. Young Helen grew up with their cook's daughter, Martha had invented more than 60 signs to communicate with each other. In 1886, Keller's mother sought answers and inspiration. She stumbled upon a drive by Charles Dickens, American Tynt and read about the successful upbringing of another deaf and blind girl, Laura Bridgeman, and soon sent Keller and her father to Baltimore, Maryland, to get to know specialist Dr. Julian Chisholm. After review Chisholm recommended Alexander Graham Bell, the inventor of the phone, who was working with deaf children at the time. Michael Angus suggested helen work with one of the institute's last alumni, Anne Sullivan went to Keller's house in Alabama on March 3, 1887. She began by teaching Helen, who was six years old, with a finger-muffling, starting with the word doll, to help Keeler understand the gift of the doll she had brought with her. She also taught other words like water, milk, teacher Helen. As Helen began to show tantrums, Sullivan asked the family for them to be isolated, so Keeler could concentrate only on Sullivan's instruction. The two moved into a cottage on the plantation. Keller began speaking classes at the Horace Mann School for the Deaf in Boston in 1890. She'll work for 25 years to learn to talk so others can understand her.
