Razor four wheeler 24 volt

I had a bunch of questions before I bought this, but I didn't really get the slot answers I was looking for, so here comes my review. Why is this not a power wheel? The frame is metallic, it is controlled by a metal chain, the engine is a solid (albeit easy to replace) unit, and the tire is rubber. It lasts a little shorter than the power wheel, but the engine moves twice as much weight. Is it dangerous compared to a power wheel? Yes, it's faster, more slatting, heavier, already, has both throttle and break, and will coast on the hills. There is no speed limit and breaks will block. There's a lot to learn. Children's reception/reaction? It wasn't jumping on and going for it. At 2 his wheel was much simpler, he was familiar with it and he had lights and buttons for the horn and engine revs sounds. He never fell on the steering wheel, but he never learned anything but steering on it. The razor was his job. He had to learn throttle (speed variable depending on input), brakes, not block his breaks, drive faster, turn slower, and pay attention. He really felt like it was a chore at first. As he got better, and could do all and more he used to do on his power wheel, the power wheel went into the shed. When he rides now, he shifts his weight and keeps his head up, he's 3 now and he rides every day and loves it. How to make it safe? I followed him for about three weeks with a tow-strap wrapped around the back handle so I could lift the back or adjust its steering. When I ran with him on the sidewalk it felt like it was about 6 to 7 MPH. It's got a real helmet and glasses, the razor crosses the line between the toy and the ATV way closely in order not to be mandatory. Is it durable? It's good to have the bolts come out because there's a lot of shaking. But the chain is good and has a shroud on it for protection. I called the warranty number to get the bolt that fell but it took six weeks to send it. Either way, if the engine is fried tomorrow, I might actually get another one and replace it.
