Take your dress, a cup of mulled cider, and step in. This week's open thread begins now. The same drill as usual, open-threader: You can chat and ask questions with your fellow readers throughout the week on the #openthread hashtag page, but our weekly open thread post is an opportunity to reach most people. Ask questions, advise, discuss productivity tips, or just chat about what's in your mind. You'll need a commenter account to participate, then you're ready to roll. An additional reminder: If you're not quite satisfied with conversations in weekly open threads or in #tips, remember that you can also share your expertise every day on our expert pages. The name's actually all the hellos' even, all is a shorter version of The Eve of Hello Day. Halo is an old English word for the holy person, and all hellos day is just another name for the day of all saints, the day on which Catholics celebrate all saints. At some point, people began discussing all the hellos as 'even Halloween' and then just Halloween. After the Jewish tradition, Christians follow several holy days from sunset one day until sunset the next day. That is where we get the practice of celebrating Christmas Eve, New Year's Eve, etc. The direct predecessor of modern-day Halloween is the celebration that is All Saints Day, which began at sunset on Oct. 31. Although it takes its name from The Day of All Saints, modern Halloween is actually a combination of many different traditions. In fact, a lot of the things we do on Halloween predate Christianity completely. In the following sections, we look at the main traditions that feed in today's Halloween and see how they all got tangled together in a holiday. Walt Disney Studios Motion Pictures 1. Halloween is an entire season, not just a night. The average person only celebrates this ancient holiday on Oct. 31. But you know it deserves far more recognition than that, so you break those faux spider webs, skulls and black candles as soon as the temperature descends below 80 degrees. 2. Pumpkins are made for jack-o-lanterns, not late. Sorry basics, but true Halloween enthusiasts know that these orange gourds are intended to be carved into scary faces. Can we suggest a vanilla latte instead? 3. When it comes to holiday movies, Halloween reigns supreme. You can keep your light-hearted family-friendly Christmas movies. We'd much rather spend our nights getting spooked by classics like Carrie, Psycho, Scream, and Friday the 13th. Even baby approved Halloween flicks are unbeatable. Think, Hocus and Halloweentown. 4 giphy.com. It's only time your macabre interests are appreciated. Haunting murder houses, or bringing real life to any other time of year gets you nothing but a little worried stares. Come Halloween, though, everyone is ready to go down the scariest of rabbit holes. 5. Coming up with your dress is almost as much fun as actually wearing it. You spend months considering your options, deciding on a different dress almost every day, but you won't have any other way of it. And once you find out what you'll be, you count the days you wear it and impress all your friends. giphy.com 6. You could throw together a legal haunted house with no effort. With soundtracks of various skeletons, faux body parts and frightening sounds you will already have a breeze, opening a seasonal charm. But you'd much rather keep your admiration for the holiday away from the public.. ı It just means too much. 7. Babies/Animals in Costumes &gt; Everything Else . There's really nothing cute than little kids or puppies decked out in miniature versions of their favorite costumes. giphy.com 8. Group costumes are the best way to bond. Whether you're looking to get a little closer to a significant other or your group of besties, coming together in solidarity is the ultimate #squadgoals to make the perfect dress. 9. Your inner child cannot get enough. A holiday dedicated to taking massive amounts of candy, playing dress, and getting scared for fun, is without a doubt the funniest way to stay connected to your youth. giphy.com this content is created and maintained by a third party, and imported to this page to help users provide their email addresses.
