

I'm not robot

Continue

Stubhub vs seatgeek

I'm sure the most savvy savers know about StubHub, the most popular online source for resale tickets for sports and entertainment events. I've used them a few times and I like the fact that I can save a few bucks from the ticket list price if someone can't make a play and didn't want to scalp them. The process is simple, well laid out, and easy to make a safe purchase. The room was quite big and comfortable. I'm not saying that other companies or even the sports teams themselves don't do that, they all take on another $10-$15 or so for a service charge that no one can explain. Welcome to SeatGeek, a new ticket reseller that doesn't advertise the base price and then hit you with big fees at the checkout. I like being able to just pull up the price list and don't have to guess at the overall price. SeatGeek is slightly different from StubHub in how they supply tickets, as well as employing other providers such as Uberseat, TicketCity and FanXchange. These providers are other online budget ticket sellers, and some may not be as reputable as others. This means that your individual experience with SeatGeek can only be as good as the actual provider from which you get tickets. The good news is that you can see which company supplies seats before buying. Here's what SeatGeek's main graphical seat selection map looks like. All prices include fees and shipping. You can see the re-seller supplying the seats, and the cost meter shows you the best deals you needed. Features of choosing My First SeatGeek shopping experience was good. I bought two tickets to a baseball match, trying to get them just undercover from the rain if that happens (it happened in two of the last three games I've attended). Browsing for the right places was easier online than it was on my phone, as there were so many places in a small space on the phone display graphically, although viewing the list was ok. I ended up shopping online because visual search was easier to see. However, if there are not many places open in one area, the presence of a visualization of available seats is an added bonus for SeatGeek over the Stubhub app. The search consists of entering a team name and event date, and then you'll see a large grouping of locations displayed. You can filter this out by entering the number of seats you buy and setting a target price, or by clicking on the seat section and then sorting those results. The selection process is very similar for both Stubhub and SeatGeek, both online and through its apps. One of the nice traits common to the two repeat sellers is their meter value. This will help you identify the best deals. StubHub has bars such as signal strength on phone to indicate the greatness of the deal, and SeatGeek shows all the places with a color circle, the greener the circle, the circle, Transactions. Additional filters for StubHub include the type of delivery and seating features. Both StubHub and SeatGeek will send you an email when prices drop if you like. Below is a map of StubHub locations. Very similar to SeatGeek, but they don't have a quick way to see the seat values in front of the selected section unless you select the Best Value tab in the filter section on the right. Reviews If you look online for user reviews, you may be scared of buying from a repeat seller such as StubHub or SeatGeek. You'll see a lot of negative reviews talking about buying tickets to events from the wrong date or even events that have already happened. Many shoppers complain about tickets that can't be scanned at the gate with barcodes on their phones. Others have problems with missing information, such as places that have limited viewing not claimed as such before buying. I glanced, and it seems, complaints against both companies are roughly equal, but I've noticed more buyers with complaints about fake tickets through SeatGeek. There are some drawbacks for sellers too. Some sellers report a bigger difference in refunds than when working with StubHub. SeatGeek won't pay sellers until after the event. StubHub pays the seller shortly after the ticket sales. It may be that SeatGeek wants to cut fraudulent sales. If the seller knows they won't pay if the buyer reports fake tickets, maybe they won't try to sell them in the first place. For legitimate sellers, this delay in getting paid may not be a big deal, but the pay rate is worth noting. The price, when it comes to getting a deal, the price will matter. SeatGeek is usually cheaper than Stubhub when shopping around sports or entertainment tickets. There are two reasons for this, first, the extra fees that most ticket sellers will try to make at the end. They believe if you've got that far you may be willing to put up with high service and shipping (most of them download) fees. The second reason is that SeatGeek advertises other sales on its website, so there is more competition to choose from. We're also not talking about a dollar or two differences. Take a look at my recent shopping experience below. This is largely in line with other searches I've completed. SeatGeek will save you money. We included FanXchange in comparison because it is a reseller that was used through the SeatGeek website for the tickets we chose. Conclusion While there is some additional risk associated with SeatGeek due to their many repeat sellers, the difference in value and lack of a hidden payment approach makes them an easy choice over Stubhub, in our opinion. However, general reviews of repeat ticket sellers in general are not good, so make sure you are smart with the purchase to some obvious mistakes. Check the date and time of the event. If stubhub is used, Stubhub, in the Exclude obstructive views under the Seat features filter box, then print the screen to confirm if you have any doubts about seat quality. Simple steps can help alleviate some of the buying risks from the re-seller market, but rewarding cheap seats is waiting for you. This post contains affiliate links, which means that if you click on one of the link products, we will receive a little compensation. Give SeatGeek a try and see for yourself interested in buying tickets to see your favorite music artist or perhaps a world-renowned sports team? There are many options out there, but who is willing to wait for hours in queues? Everything is done online these days. Shoppers get tickets to their favorite activities without having to leave their bedrooms for a more comfortable experience. Your options are quite diverse when it comes to companies dealing with your ticket. Some of them can stand out in the crowd thanks to their reputations among buyers, ticket prices, fees and excellent customer experience - SeatGeek vs StubHub. Known as the two leading companies on the market, there must be something good about them. But what is it? This quick review will give you all the information you need to make a good decision as a buyer. Seatgeek VS StubHub - Choosing a Ticket Ticket Choice is the most important factor when comparing SeatGeek vs. StubHub. SeatGeek specializes in sporting events and aims to dominate the market. You can find tickets for almost every sport, major league or even the middle leagues. You can also follow your favorite clubs or sports people and get quick notifications about events and ticket prices. SeatGeek also deals with musical events, theatrical plays and shows. You will find tickets to the best performances, plays and even wrestling events. In addition to following artists and locations, potential buyers can also follow cities. StubHub follows the same trend when it comes to finding tickets and events. As a buyer, you can browse the company's website for sports, music and theater performances. There are many options emerging when you are looking for something in particular. In addition, StubHub also allows you to follow artists and places for a fuller experience. Seatgeek VS StubHub - Site experience You don't want to spend half an hour buying or selling tickets, right? By comparing SeatGeek vs. StubHub, you want to know which one offers a more intuitive feeling. SeatGeek has a very simple homepage and interface. While you may find a few artists and ideas on the homepage, you'll likely have to look for anything you're interested in. The top menu will give you access to all kinds of events and additional features. StubHub has a more diversified homepage, with lots of recommendations based on your location and more. If you are not sure you can simply view the first page for online offers. The company allows you to change the location (add another), but you can also take advantage of the top menu in search of tickets. Seatgeek VS StubHub - The experience of applying both SeatGeek and StubHub have their own apps - available in both the Apple Store and the Play Store. There are not many differences between actual websites and apps - same fees, features, ticket selection and online experiences. If you're a regular buyer, the app will prove more convenient - a few taps and you have tickets. In addition, both SeatGeek and StubHub send notifications through their apps - often a more convenient option than receiving spam emails. Seatgeek VS StubHub - SeatGeek's deliveries and returns are slightly more limited than StubHub when it comes to ticket and delivery formats. The fee is also affected by the choice of delivery. For example, SeatGeek can send tickets via email or app. You can print them yourself if you like, but many seats accept digital tickets - make sure you check in advance. StubHub, on the other hand, allows you to choose - digital tickets against paper tickets. Getting them through the app is perhaps the most convenient way. If you want them by email, you will be amazed by stubhub's additional fees. The fee will also apply if you want StubHub to send you physical tickets. It is much easier to go through the checkout process, get everything in the application and print out the tickets yourself. Seatgeek VS StubHub - Ease of Use When comparing SeatGeek vs StubHub, you should be aware that both portals are easy to use and intuitive. The same procedure applies to both of them. Look for the ticket you want, go through the list of available tickets, select the one you want and go to the checkout page, where you'll also see all the fees. The same procedure should be followed if you are using the app. Even if this is the first time you buy a ticket online, there are plenty of portals that provide a simple experience - the two don't make exceptions. Seatgeek VS StubHub - SeatGeek customer service has readily available customer service. Feel free to use the chat feature available on each page - easy for instant replies. You can also find the phone number or simply drop the email. Getting help via online chat is by far the best option. StubHub has good and knowledgeable customer service, but getting there is not so easy. You'll need an account. If you want to ask questions about your account or something else, it's not really possible. Also, there is no live chat. Both SeatGeek vs StubHub have online help sections - FAS and the most common problems and solutions, whether you need help with a ticket, fees or checkout process. When it comes to phone calls, waiting times longer for StubHub - about 10 minutes on average, but it depends on what time of day Call. Seatgeek VS StubHub - StubHub's security and security is probably the biggest player in the secondary market, which means it doesn't deal directly with venues and artists. With more than 10 million tickets available, it obviously has a mass of potential buyers, so it aims to maintain safety standards to the highest levels. For the same reason, you can add more types of payment solutions so everyone can buy the tickets they need. SeatGeek, on the other hand, browses dozens of ticketing websites to ensure the results you're looking for. It has the same high security protocols, so transactions are secure. If you're sending a third-party website, make sure it's repugnant. SeatGeek is not responsible for the security standards associated with other websites. Seatgeek VS StubHub - Fees and fees are standard but not flat for StubHub. As a buyer, you will pay 10% extra for all processing and organization. This is a service fee. As a seller, you can sell tickets for free. Once they sell, you'll need to pay 15% - a processing fee. SeatGeek has a different approach. Buyer's fee varies at the event, artist, venue or venue. Fees can get quite high, but they can also fall under market value. They are included in the price, so you have an easier approach - it is much easier to decide on the actual cost of the ticket. As a seller, you will pay 20% on SeatGeek. Seatgeek VS StubHub - SeatGeek features and additional features feature for those unfamiliar with places and places. Deal Score analyzes everything - from venue to venue - to determine valuations. The higher the ticket score, the better the deal becomes. StubHub, on the other hand, allows you to buy tickets until the last moment - minutes before the start of the performance. The fanprotector's warranty is another good extra as it ensures you get tickets to the actual event. Seatgeek VS StubHub - Verdict As a brief final conclusion, the SeatGeek comparison against StubHub won't really bring too many differences. Both platforms operate in exactly the same industry, but they have different operating principles. One is a broker and the other works like a search engine. Ticket prices range from one portal to another too. Taking into account their fees, functions and ticket prices, it's up to you to make the final choice. However, it is worth checking both options before buying tickets. Start shopping now