A coyote columbus story lesson plan

Author: Thomas King Illustrator: William Kent Monkman Grade Level: Preschool Kindergarten Buy It Here! Resources Summary Coyote is the ruler of her world, she creates everything from rainbows to television commercials, but what she loves most is playing ball. Coyote always tries to find someone to play with her and doesn't like to loosen up. In her search for new players, Coyote meets a funny red-haired man named Columbus and his crew of clowns, but they weren't interested in playing ball, all they wanted to do was find a way to get rich. Suddenly, Coyote's world changes when Columbus catches her human friends and sells them in Spain to wealthy people. It's story inviting kids to learn about Columbus' travels from an indigenous point of view, it's full of colorful illustrations and entertainment. Element Three : Issues of Social Injustice This story sets from a native perspective, it reveals the real motives behind Columbus' travels and the oppression suffered by Native Americans as a result. In this story, Christopher Columbus is portrayed not as a hero who discovered America, but instead exposes the atrocities he committed against Native Americans, a society of kind and peaceful people. In this story coyote what is the creator of her world is always looking to play someone ball with her, when all of the sudden she meets Columbus and his crew, who she describes as a bad manners and just wants to look for gold and things to sell. When Coyote learns of Columbus' intention to sell the people in her world, she laughed and thought how stupid and insane it would be for someone to sell or buy people, who actually happened, related to the history of injustice committed by Columbus against Native Americans. In the book, Columbus was keen to get rich and sell Coyote's friends in Spain to get deliciousness and a used Mercedes. It describes how greedy Columbus was and how he didn't see Native Americans as equal but inferior. Instead of being grateful for their good hospitality columbus and his crew suppress their people and take their lands. In the story, we learned how Columbus' travels changed Native American's lives forever and how he uses power and strength to achieve it. Activity: Children can work in groups of four and rethink the story using fun illustrations on a construction paper. Once they're done, they can share their story with the class and share their favorite and share the least favorite part of the story, they'll be able to share their understanding of events, ask questions and get feedback. The projects must be displayed in the classroom once their presentation is done. There in journals or a piece of paper, they can also sign their favorite least favorite character of the story and write 5 reasons for their The students can also replay the story and come up with a different end to the story. Author: Nikki Giovanni Illustrated by: Bryan Collier Grade Level: 3rd Grade - 5th Grade Summary: The book starts with Rosa Parks, a beloved seam string, leaving work and getting on the bus. When she get on the bus, there are no more seats in the colored section and she sits in the white section. When she refuses to move, she is arrested. Word travels to Dr. Jo Ann Robinson, a professor at the University of Alabama and the president of the Women's Political Council. Dr. Robinson collects twenty-five women in her office to begin organizing the Montgomery Bus Boycott. The book goes on to show how these events lead to Dr. Martin Luther King Jr and the November 13, 1956 Supreme Court case Browder v. Gayle Ends Bus Segregation that ruled segregation in public places to be illegal. Element 4: Rosa is a great example of Social Movements and Social Changes because it shows how a social movement can begin. Rosa Parks' story and the Montgomery bus boycott show how an everyday person's choices and bravery can start a movement. The book also shows light for the strong women of the Civil Rights movement who usually come across shadow by other male civil rights leaders. Rosa does a great job of scratching the surface of the start of the Civil Rights Movement and Montgomery Bus Boycotts and introducing the players students may know, Rosa Parks and Martin Luther King Jr., and introducing people like Dr. Jo Ann Robinson into these events. Activity: Rosa does a great job of showing how everyday people, nates, mothers and teachers, can start a movement. It makes a great journal prompt of what can you do as an everyday person that can be extraordinary. To start the lesson, brainstorm ideas with your students about what they can do that can help community there. Remind students that it doesn't have to be as big as helping to start the Civil Rights movement, but rather small changes we would like to see in our community. Use examples like clearing the playground, snack choices in the cafeteria, and other ways they can become more active in helping the community and creating change. If to have the students go back and write about what they might want to do to help their community. Buy it here! Resources! This week I learned a lesson about writing a recommendation on a book for a book report. The students write 3 or 4 book report a term, on award-winning novels of different genres. The student reports have shown that very few of them understand how to write a recommendation. Many simply wrote: I don't have one. I started a lesson by giving them a simple formula to write a recommendation. This should include two things: your opinion and specific examples from the book to support criticism or praise. I shared a few examples with I told them to use elements of story that stood out to them. I told them trying to write about the strengths and weakness of the novel. We then practiced writing recommendations. I created the students a T-chart with the titles: positive and negative. I read them a Coyote Columbus Story by Thomas King. As I read, they had to write down things they liked and didn't like using specific examples on their T chart. After that, each student wrote a positive and negative recommendation. I must admit that I chose this book for a secondary reason. I plan to teach a unit about ancient civilizations of the North America. I used this book as a thermometer of sorts to gauge the students' reactions to the content of the book. The book uses many indigenous storytelling methods from oral traditions and presents an indigenous worldview of the Columbus encounter. All but five of the students were completely baffled by the story. Many were uncomfortable with the ideas on offer, but most were downright confused. It's a really good thing for me to know about the class. It gives me an entry point for my unit. Unlike books written by non-Indigenous people, these books present Indigenous Peoples as dynamic and capable of resistance rather than complicit in their own disposal. You may also like to come with us, on a mid-August night, to a secluded beach on the Pacific Northwest Coast. There we will meet many creatures who make Hideaway Cove their home. From the black bear to the smallest beach hopper, we'll catch a glimpse of their night-time activities. We will also learn how the moon affects the tides and explores the intertidal zones. A night at Hideaway Cove is a sequel to Hideaway Cove, another exploration of the Pacific Northwest Coast during the day. Written by Brenda Boreham, and illustrated by Laura Timmermans, both books share with us the many within a healthy marine ecosystem. ReviewsThis is very thoughtful and charming details in both the text and illustrations, such as the moon's movement across the sky Laura's illustrations and the subtle introduction of numbers as the narrative progresses. The moon is a major focus of the story-kids will learn about how it affects the tides and what it means for beach creatures like raccoons, who are able to feed for an easy meal under the pile of seaweed left along the shoreline as the tide goes out. Four back pages provide information on the moon, intertidal zones and beach creatures, making this book useful for ecosystem units and lessons on astronomy. A final page with suggestions on how to respect and protect sea creatures and habitats when exploring coastal areas invites discussions on environmental awareness. A night at Hideaway Cove is sure to delight and inform young readers. - Canadian Teacher Magazine, 2019 Winter Issue Educator InformationRecommended for K-3.
