Features Sony Handycam DCR-SR68/SR88 INPUTS/DC outputs in/mini USB, AV White Balance Auto, Outdoor, Indoors, Manual Scene Modes Auto, Twilight, Candle, Sunrise and Sunset, Fireworks, Landscape, Portrait, Spotlight, Sport, Beach, Snow Focus Auto, Guide, Spot AF, Tele Macro Color Effects No lens cover (automatically or manually) Manual video coverage/flash LED video/no accessory shoes No This video camera has been designed for unprofessional recording and, as such, does not have many additional shooting options. Most of my field tests were done with SR68/SR88 set to Auto for white balance, stage selection and focus, and it performed satisfactorily. There are more scene options if you decide to get specific and the same applies to white balance. Also, if you want to be more hands-on with focus and exposure, you can control how touching a place on the screen from which you want the camera to draw your information. For its low status, the SR68/ SR88 works pretty well. It has an instant option that gets the camera on the power and is ready to record very quickly by simply opening the LCD (not uncommon, but nice nonetheless). Autofocus is adaptive, but when enlarged, it hunts, trying to concentrate, especially in low light conditions. The nominal battery life for the included package is 100 minutes of continuous shooting; expect less if you turn clips on and off frequently. Long-time batteries are available, one of which Sony claims has a lifespan of up to 13 hours of continuous shooting. The video quality as a whole is very soft; the only time a somewhat sharp picture was obtained, it was in telepromptuation mode. The clips also display quite a lot of noise and digital artifacts until you've figured out YouTube sizes. There is a clear noise pattern that is also a distraction. There's a noticeably purple ocante around the objects as well. If you still live entirely in a low-resolution world, the recordings are designed for video sharing websites, or just want to capture the moment no matter what it looks like, SR68/SR88 will s sufficient. The colors look normal, but cooler than they should be. Low-light video is loaded with grainy noise and yellow inclusions. An LED lamp can help a little if your object is close to the lens, but it does little to improve video quality and certainly won't illuminate remote objects. Finally, while the video camera still takes pictures, you're more likely to get the best photos from your camera phone and they can't be captured if you record a video. It's true, you can get much better video from an HD camcorder that costs $100 to $200 more. However, standard definition video is less demanding to play and edit desktop or laptop, and SD cameras are less expensive. With Sony Handycam DCR-SR68/SR88 you trade from video quality to lots of memory and 60s zum lenses. Of course, this is small, small, and easy to use, too. Just don't wait for HD when you pay for an SD. Learn more about how we test camcorders.
