Community colleges have long been a more economically viable option for four-year colleges and universities. More than 5.7 million students were enrolled in public two-year universities in 2016, according to a report by the American Association of Community Colleges. And with the rise of the digital classroom, more and more students are opting to enroll in two-year community colleges to start their academic journey. Community colleges are a great place to test academic waters and save money at the same time. This guide was created to help students learn more about the online community college experience, from tuition costs to insights on how online learning programs work. Students can use this guide to determine if enrolling in an online community college is the right fit for them. 7 reasons to choose online community colleges There are many reasons why students choose community colleges in four-year universities, but cost savings are definitely a primary factor. According to the National Center for Education Statistics, the average cost of full-time in-state tuition at public two-year colleges for the 2016-2017 academic year was just over $4,000. That compares favorably to public four-year college-in-state tuition costs at an average of $7,800. Of course, tuition costs are very low in some institutions, and much higher on others. For example, tuition costs at Los Angeles Trade Technical College are incredibly low at $43 per unit. The average cost of tuition at all private, non-profit four-year universities, meanwhile, was $27,276 for the 2016-2017 school year. Students mortgage their economic future with years of student loan loans for higher education when they don't enroll in community colleges. Rates of tuition at online community colleges vary by institution. Many online community colleges accept students at state tuition rates, meaning distance learners don't pay steep out-of-state tuition rates. That's the case at Waubensee Community College in Aurora, Ill., which charges the same fees of $126 per semester hour in state students and distance learners. Other community colleges, meanwhile charge distance learners have an e-learning rate, which is lower than out-of-state tuition but exceeds the cost in the state. For example, tuition in the state at John Tyler Community College in Chester, Va., is $151 per credit hour. The college's e-rate for out-of-state distance learning is $254 — which is less than the cost of 37 percent of state students who enroll in on-campus programs pay at $348 per credit. Distance learners will often have to pay modest technology and other additional fees that colleges use to enrich their online content and programming. A great place for community college students to dip their toes in college water into a more comfortable and relaxed setting — especially those students who are strong high school seniors and do not repeat any general education course. Distance learning at online community colleges allows for a more school-life balance because students can study when it is most convenient for them. Community colleges often provide night and weekend classes to better accommodate busy student schedules, another layer of flexibility that leads to better school-life balance for community college students. Brandy Scarati, program director of The WebCollege of Truckee Meadows Community College in Reno, Nev., says flexibility is a major consideration for students enrolling in online community colleges. A lot of our students work full time and have family responsibilities, but also want to attend college to improve their education, says Scarati. By being able to take online classes, students can schedule their own schedules and study when they find time. Students may be able to fit into more classrooms in their program than if they were on a campus due to shorter travel time and the flexibility of completing course work at home. Who benefits from online community college, community college students have a more diverse demographic than student bodies at four-year universities, and this distance is also true for learners. Students in online community college generally fall into the following categories: College experience to transfer new students who have been away from college for a few years or more are transferring students and wrapping up degree requirements or introducing fresh military and experienced students attending college on international F-1 visas. High school students earning early college credit can benefit from all of these student demographics attending online community colleges. Additionally, admission policies are open to help students start their academic careers easily in most community colleges. It might be especially useful for students who struggle in high school since they don't need strong academic tapes for admission like they would if they were applying to a competitive four-year university. Students can also benefit from taking classes part-time so they work full time to support themselves and their families Can keep up. TMCC's Brandy Skarnati Scarati in Reno Any potential student can benefit from taking classes at an online community college. Students take classes at a community college to get their AA degree, which can be completed online, she says. Students also attend community colleges to gain the skills needed to obtain a promotion for the industry or gain employment with a company. Students can also take online classes for personal knowledge and development. How do effective online college programs work? First and foremost, prospective online students should understand the nature of the digital class. What it pictures in a fitness facility isn't boot camp-style training. An instructor produces motivation to bark the order and help people get hard work done. This is not the case with online learning- there is no formal classroom, so it can be easy to linger on responsibilities because students don't see instructors face-to-face. Students are responsible for self-motivation, and they can easily fall behind if they do not establish a proper study habits. What it is a highly flexible learning environment that allows students to pursue higher education at their own pace. That said, time management and self-discipline are at a premium. Distance learners should also be a food of tech savvy, as online courses require the use of a digital content management system and communication tools such as email, chat and even video conferencing. Here are several other important questions potential distance learners often ask about online community college programs: The support services of good online community college programs offer most distance learners as they do for traditional on-campus students. These include online student orientation, academic advice, career planning, research, online tuition and even access to online libraries and databases to support online success coaches. Many colleges also have fully dedicated staff to support online students. Generally, community colleges offer associate degree programs online when all required coursework can be completed in a digital classroom. This includes studies in business, communication, web design, general studies, language and many other areas. Some degree programs, such as allied health careers such as phlebotomy or radiologic technology, can mostly be completed online. Students must usually complete the necessary diagnostic or laboratory experience on campus or at an approved facility. Students in most community colleges are required to complete online application before registration. They may also need high school tape to gauge the student's academic qualifications so students register for the right classes. Once the application has been accepted, students can register for classes and pay for them. Email students online before course start dates with instruction about colleges College's Online Course Management System. Students may also have to complete a new student online orientation before starting classes. Mainly via email, but also with video conferencing tools like chat and even Skype. Online instructors usually keep regular office hours just like counterparts on their campus so students can easily reach them when necessary. Online class formats College deliver online classes in various formats through content management systems like blackboard, moodle, canvas or desire 2Learn. The formats outlined below are the most common distribution options: web based classes are distributed completely online with face-to-face interactions with instructors. However, students may still have to take the Proctor exam on campus or through an approved proctoring service. Hybrid or mixed hybrid or mixed courses combine traditional on-campus studies with online learning activities. Students still meet with instructors, but seat time is short in favor of digital learning. Web-enhanced or web-assisted classes are held on campus, but professors direct students to the online content management system for course syllabus, assignments, handouts and other course materials. Cable broadcast or video lecture courses are distributed through local cable television or through pre-recorded videos. There is no set formula for the way community colleges choose to distribute content online. Students should check with their potential community colleges about online delivery options and content management platforms before registration to ensure that classes are distributed in a format with which they are comfortable. A 4-year school across the country moved from an online community college to community colleges to help foster the easier transition to four-year universities through four-year transfer agreements with select colleges and universities. Students who complete an online transfer degree on the California virtual campus are guaranteed admission to any institution in the California State University system. It's similar to students who complete associate degrees from any institution in the Virginia community colleges system — they are also guaranteed admission to several dozen Virginia-based colleges and nine other colleges and universities. And the North Carolina community college system is a broad expression agreement with public universities in the state that regulates the transfer of credits between the state's public community colleges and universities. Students whose ultimate goal is to earn a bachelor's degree should check with their potential institutions about transfer agreements before enrollment at the community college level. Potential transfers to students too Should consider preparing a transfer plan by examining and consulting with their academic advice faculty Learn more about all the factors in a major, general education needs and lower division curriculum that they can meet when enrolling in their community college. Some community colleges also have tuition reciprocity agreements so that residents in some areas do not have to pay higher tuition fees. Finally, students should take great care to ensure that their community college has regional or national recognition, as colleges usually only earn loans from already accredited postsecondary institutions. Students should follow these eight steps as a checklist for online community college checklist students who have decided to enroll in an online community college what is needed to become a distance learner. Take a virtual campus tour You can never put foot on campus, but many colleges offer virtual tours of their facilities. Apply for admission the first step in the admission process is to file an online application. Students can also leave by the registrar's office of their prospective college and fill out one in person. Research tuition costs, and the struggle of scholarships and financial aid information paid to college have derailed many a student. To ensure that you meet the deadline for federal financial assistance and potential scholarships, start this process as soon as possible. Filling out a free application for federal student aid (FAFSA) is the first step. Submit Reading and Mathematics Test Scores Colleges need to know the ACT scores to ensure that they meet the minimum qualification requirements for English and Mathematics. Students who have been away from high school for many years should consult their college admission office - they may have to take placement tests. Colleges may also need a high school transcript. Complete Orientation for Online Classes Many colleges need distance learners to complete online orientation before registration. Register for classes Once students have been formally accepted to a community college, they are assigned a college account ID they can use to register for online classes. Familiarize yourself with campus services colleges, providing a wide range of student support services such as academic advice, counseling and online tuition. These contacts have been bookmarked prematurely. Log in and start your educational travel login as soon as classes are available through your college's content management system, usually the first week of the semester. Students who fail to do so may lose their seats. Be sure to note all course requirements and deadlines. Online learning is not for everyone how to succeed in online learning. Distance after these five stages can help learners excel in digital class. Online learners are strong planners and organizers. A weekly workflow program And honestly stick to it. Online learners require a dedicated As well as assignments and working time to complete studies. Avoid time-wasting distractions like social media and internet surfing. Students may be hesitant to raise their hands in the classroom for fear of being the focal point for 20 or more pairs of eyes. This pressure and anxiety does not exist in an online classroom. Ask questions. Reach out to peers and professors to give input, or for explanations and guidance. You will promote better relationships with trainers and classmates and feel more engaged with coursework. Time for professors to answer questions, and learn course management software. Issues with coursework always come to the fore – don't wait until the last minute to start the assignment so you have time to solve the problems and come up with a solution. This is perhaps the most important tip of all. Flourishing in an online learning environment requires an iron will. Students need to be self-motivated and need good time management skills. Online classes are generally not self-paced. Students need to realize that there are reasons for work dates that will need to be followed. A myth online classes are easier than traditional classes - that's not the case. Students in online classes will also have to complete interactive discussions and group projects. Students often need to check in their online class and attend online classes to succeed.
