keep at least two out of the three checkpoints while shelving up kills, so if the opposing team starts taking them while you hunker down, you'll have to head out. Unless, of course, you are already ahead on points, in which case just consolidate your position and force them to come your way. will have to if they want to score any of the Own. Just don't let them. With the amount of airtime and control you can enjoy in Destiny 2, it's really tempting to jump and fly around the Crucible on a whim. But don't. Much like in a fighting game, while aerial games can give you advantages in attack, if used carefully and strategically, unnecessary jumps will leave you exposed. Ground-based combat is always a safer bet. Jumping should primarily be used to make a surprise escape when the odds are stacked against you and you should always aim for cover while doing so. That said, there are certainly ways to use airtime offensively. If you're about to engage a one-on-one fight, kicking things out from a place of elevation can give you an advantage if you can surprise your opponent with it, jump on disorienting close-range, and do consistent, precise damage as you move through the air. But if you jump on the long distance and fail to do damage while weathering, you're just making your opponent an easy shot. Knowing how to deal with an incoming super Watch an opponent unleash their super attack is no longer the end of the world. Destiny 2's supers are now largely built around doing sustained, roaming damage instead of throwing out one-hit kills - leaving the user exposed for a long time if they want to make the best of their offense. Supers like Fists of Havoc struggle to close the gap and can be handled relatively easily, while Supers like Daybreak attack from range. Pay attention to what supers are used and retreat or sight in appropriate. Supers are also so much rarer now that you have to wait until using them will really count – be aware of their potential use in countering opponents' supers. For example, if you see an Arcstrider Hunter jumping an Arc staff up close and you don't have time to respond with shots, a vertical jump that's been launched in a Warlock Nova Bomb will lift you to safety from the ground-based attack and let you eliminate the threat before it can hurt the rest of your team. Similarly, a Titan Sentinel's shield guard can actually block a Nova Bomb. Bomb.
