Best movies 20015

It may be true that the Best Picture winner of the past five years was released in the last quarter of the year, but that doesn't mean there are no gems to be found in the months before the summer chill falls. From film festival darlings to action reboots, new adaptations of classic literature to double-manned biopics, 2015 already offers a wealth of inspirational fare for cinephiles. As we begin our march towards the holiday movie season, I think it's about time we looked back at some of the movies of 2015 that we might still need to see, and those that have the best hopes for the New Year. So, no further way, here are 30 of the must-see movies of 2015. (And click on the title to read den full of geek reviews!Kingsman: Secret Service (February 13, 2015) February release or inadequate trailer don't fool you, Kingsman: Secret Service has a lot to go for it for both talent in front of and behind the camera. From layer cake director Matthew Bourne and his longtime script co-writer Jane Goldman, the next project comes from a collaboration that includes Stardust, Kick-Ass and X-Men: First Class. This time from the bottomless big idea machine it is also a mark mirror based on another cartoon property. But there's more to Kingsman than behind-the-scenes talent: in front of camera fans, he can always see Colin Firth in a perfectly fit role, James Bond 007 a British secret agent named Harry Hart. And this film about a good old boys club that doesn't dwell on franchise restrictions and includes Michael Caine and Samuel L. Jackson in M style roles as villains has too much potential to at least check out and see if there's another hidden popcorn colonel in the treasure like the last two comic book-inspired sugar rushes on this creative team. Buy Kingsman: Amazon's Secret Service. It continues (March 13, 2015) We all had that dream: something that is not human or unknown - it - following you. But for David Robert Mitchell's second feature, it knows exactly what we are: one of the best horror movies in years. It's not just a dreamy retreat into the synthesizers and primitive teen horrors of John Carpenter's best 1970s and 80s movies, but a wonderfully original nightmare landscape in itself. When Jay (Mica Monroe) sleeps with a boyfriend she should have avoided, she is unfairly punishedCurse of sexually transmitted diseases: follow her wherever she go until she has her in its grasp, and it consumes her whole thing. This is a terrible concept that has been fully pursued in this disturbing environment. Subsequent purchases on Amazon. Furious 7 (April 3, 2015) On our list last year, Fast & Furious 7 was one of the most expected films of 2014 until paul walker's tragic passing. Vin Diesel may be the American muscle car build of the franchise, but Walker was the engine that powered it through maximum height (i.e. Fast Five). Now fast & furious 7 stands as the last tribute to the very missed movie star, the last hula for the entire unharmed gang. In addition, director James Wang (Insidious, Conjuring) took over the franchise's steering wheel for the first cruise outside the horror genre in nearly a decade. It's good to see a man with that much talent out of his comfort zone, at least with a sorry pulp. Throwing a true introduction to Jason Statham as a big, average heavy and hopefully the first good of the seven movies, we're all looking at this ride and shouting shotgun. Watch Furious 7 on Amazon. Science fiction has often dreamed of the concept of altilical intelligence. But in what is likely to be the smartest genre of film of the year, screenwriter Alex Garland is happy to fear it. Not that he doesn't have an apocalyptic view of the existence of sentimental robots. He likes them better than we do. So, ex Machina, enter a completely insidious con game that will get under your skin as the viewer won't know if the character is being Turing tested. Or if the audience is. Caleb (Domhnall Gleeson) is ostensibly invited to the country estate of his CEO (Oscar Isaac) to test the AI of a robot named Ava (Alicia Vikander). But he soon discovers that he may be a real guinea pig on this quietly hypnotic trip to madness. Watch Ex Machina on Amazon. Sils Maria's Cloud (April 10, 2015) probably positions itself as the modern All About Eve, and Sils Maria's cloud looks like a dismemberment of fangs and self-awareness of the role of femininity and sexuality in the modern world. Starring three generations of women in The Dream Town - Juliette Binoche, Kristen Stewart and Chloe Grace Moretz - Clouds is about Maria Enders of Binoche, a famous actress who is asked to revive her famous play 20 years ago when she played a charming young girl who drove her boss to suicide. Except now, she's been asked to play her life-ending boss, and it's the young girl who boils down the upstart Joan Ellis (Moretz). Maria thinks that if she is drawn back to the Swiss town of Sils Maria, she can swallow her anger, but she knows little of her assistant (Stewart) or the globalized remodeling of women today. The acidity of the premise burns only,Buy Clouds of Sils Maria on Amazon. Mad Max: Fury Road (May 15, 2015) It was a long, tough road to another flick starring Max Rocatansky hitting the big screen. Even real movie stars have broken out from the controversial Mel Gibson to the much more box office-friendly Tom Hardy on the edge of the Hollywood moment, to celebrities almost as big as the already impressive range of talent. But most of all, Mad Max: Fury Road just looks cool. If you've seen the trailer for Comic-Con, you can easily see that this made the biggest splash of all the movie panels in San Diego this year. George Miller has returned to his outback hell copied by a million films. But once again, he proves that no one can find beauty on a barren, desolate path in a movie like he can. Miller's return to the old-school in-camera spectacle, which expressed the film as a two-hour chase scene, will certainly pursue all action fans al perfectly. Get Mad Max: Fury Road on Amazon. The Jurassic World (June 12, 2015) reboot is generally tricky business. Essentially trying to re-create the thrill of proven classics with most of those original elements, it needs to appeal to old fans while getting a new one. Hang 1000 on that challenge as you try to regain the grandeur and joy of Steven Spielberg's last sorry popcorn classic, 1993's Jurassic Park. But there is still reason for Spielberg to be optimistic beyond lending his name as executive producer. First of all, Colin Trevorrow, the highly promising director behind the Safety Not guarantee, is spearheading the production. Secondly, it does so in Isla Nubbler (an island from the first film) which has actually become a successful theme park. Providing the chance for dinosaurs to be torn apart by tourists, like the dysfunctional Mickey Mouse, returns to the horrors of writer Michael Crichton's film theme park, the appeal of its first foray into Westworld. Jurassic World also boasts a talented young cast including safety Jake Johnson, Bryce Dallas Howard and Chris Pratt in the brilliance of guardians of the galaxy movie stars. Like the T-Rex at the heart of the visitor, you just need to bite. Watch Jurassic World on Amazon. Me and Earl and the Dying Girl (June 12, 2015) Increasingly, dying teenagers seem to be a genre. But the tragedy of this wonderful little Sundance comedy manages to overturn all of those expectations while offering something. By flatly avoiding the star-beyond-the-star heartstring pulls we've seen before, this comedy plays with a familiar thope about adulthood with a sense of self-reference musement, as Greg's (Thomas Mann) protagonist is an eternal high school lone wolf/movie snob who doesn't really connect with his peers. But he somehowShe friends with Rachel (Olivia Cooke) after being diagnosed with cancer (because his mom forced him). The film recognizes that it spends its own film location as well as the days of recreating foreign classics with their limited budget and technology, many of them since Greg and Earl (RJ Cyler). They are hardly prepared to handle the delicacy required to begin what the subtitles of the film announced in Friendship of Destiny – Day 1, Connie, Britton, Nick Offerman, Molly Shannon and John Bernthal offer great supporting work as adults in Greg's life, but the real stand-out is the effervescence Cook in a role that treats deadpans, wisps and hilarious ghosts equally. Get a dying girl with me on Amazon. It's so painful to admit the truth: the closest Pixar movie is nearly a year away. With the Good Dinosaur delay taking it out of the 2014 lineup, we're leaving a two-year gap between Monsters University and Inside Out last summer. But for those who fear Pixar has lost its ambitions, the inside-out premise alone promises the greatest animated effort Hollywood has produced in years. Directed by one of Pixar's original brain trusts, Peter Docter (writer of Monsters Inc., Toy Story 2, Wall E, Up) and scripted by Michael Arndt (Toy Story 3, Hunger Games: Grabbing Fire), Inside Out goes big by entering the smallest, most confusing place imaginable: Young girl brain. When Riley is forced to move from Minnesota to San Francisco, a new emotional Cornucia boils over the surface of her mind, affecting every action she does. This includes feelings of anger (Lewis Black), Fear (Bill Hader), disgust (Mindy Kaling), sadness (Phyllis Smith) and Joy (Amy Poehler). Literally a story that happens on the battlefield of a child's mind, the next Pixar project ambitiously aims to explain from a fresh perspective why people's emotions act like them. For now, the idea only brings the sound of polars for us. Buy Inside Out on Amazon. Trainwreck (July 17, 2015) Amy Schumer delivers the best comedy of the summer in Trainwreck. As a sublimely filthy union between director Judd Apatow and screenwriter Amy Schumer, the film turns the romantic comedy Thope over their heads and delivers a brilliant cameo by LeBron James as romcom Branch Besty. For those who think romance can be a four-letter word, this is swearing (and gaff). Get Trainwreck on Amazon. Ant-Man (July 17, 2015) and one of the most expected summer movies of 2015 are already the biggest disappointments. Because no matter how much we shrink, given the completely unique style of geeky Aul, not to mention the seven-year build-up, the fact that we're not getting Edgar Wright's Ant-Man becomes an eternal disgrace. Still, marvel studios' other summersNext year's event and curiosity cannot be denied. Peyton Reid has made surprisingly attractive screwball efforts before (Bling It On, Down With Love) and if this turns into a joys success, it will definitely be a curveball surprise. Also with a cast that includes Paul Rudd, Michael Douglas and Corey Stoll, the picture is still talented enough to keep the flame of hope alive for fans. Marvel Studios just made the biggest hit of the summer with a movie about talking raccoons and walking trees. Sure, they can pull the rabbit out of this hat, right? Buy Ant-Man on Amazon. Mission: Impossible – Rogue Nation (July 31, 2015) Mission Strengths: The Impossible franchise is a fresh start for each installment. Whether this current project is a success or a failure, the next film is an opportunity to start from scratch, saving for one constant of Tom Cruise in the heroic role of Ethan Hunt. After less effort like John Wu's Mission: Impossible II (2000) and J.J. Abrams' TV Scale Mission: Impossible III (2006), it was a blessing, but it's a bit disappointing after Brad Bird's Kinetic Mission: Impossible - Ghost Protocol. Nevertheless, just as Bird was able to re-wrap this franchise into the 2011 Christmas Day event, there is plenty of room for Christopher Macquarie to make his own stamp on the IMF series with a second effort with Cruise after Jack Riecher. This form of orschach testing of the franchise makes Mission: Impossible Downtlight Boldness in its big-screen espionage, in an era when it is obligated to keep the same as all other series installments that came before. (Read the full review of Rogue Nation here.) Getting the mission: Impossible – Rogue Nation of the Amazon .Mosteth America (August 14, 2015) Noah Baumbach returns to Francis ha Muse with Greta Gerwig, who together created the film's hilarious and sorry flightal appeal. Ostensibly another film about 20 or 30 women pursuing high jinks in the Big Apple, Misses America is actually much more original than that and instead works as something axed by millennial screwball comedy. All the performers, especially Gerwig, bring an affable sense of madness to the progression, and this story, which tells her life's lesson in what a 32-year-old woman named Brooke (Gerwig) doesn't do to her 18-year-old protege Tracy (Laura Kirk), becomes the nastiest ensemble piece to invade Greenwich, Connecticut. Buy Mrs. America on Amazon. Black Mass (September 18, 2015) Bulger is the most talked about gangster of the last quarter century. The Boston crime boss, who turned out to be an FBI rat, was the inspiration for The Favorite to the Town's big-screen character until the Fed announced it was trying to exterminate rodents. He was also the subject of a documentary, vs. This Year, which is not so fantastical.United States applauded us. Now Hollywood wants to get back to this well-poisoned poison from the heart of Dorchester and Southley, and we hope it's a shot in the arm that Johnny Depp needs artistically and professionally. That Depp plays Bulger from gangster to fugitive is the juicy part where Depp should spill his guts like a stool pigeon himself. The film is based on a dick rail book and is directed by Scott Cooper. (Read our full review here.) Watch Black Mass on amazon. The Martian (October 2, 2015) When Ridley Scott did sci-fi in the past, two of the previous three efforts gave us Aliens and Blade Runner. So his odds are still pretty high going into his big screen adaptation of The Martian, the 2011 bestselling Andy Weir novel. And with a script by Drew Goddard, matt damon, Jessica Chastain, Jeff Daniels, Michael Pena, Kate Mara, Kristen Wig, Chiwetel Ejiofial, Donald Glover, Sean Bean and many more are the optimism the film offers. Beyond its pedigree, the film looks very promising on the premise of a high-survival concept about astronauts accidentally rounding out to the planet Mars. While his crew and NASA are vying to save his life, he has less than a month to figure out how to survive years on an alien planet. It certainly sounds like a must-see to us. Watch The Martian in the Amazon. Steve Jobs (October 9, 2015) The biopic is a dozen, but Danny Boyle and Aaron Sorkin's Steve Jobs is a different achievement from such banality. By heralding the genre's trolls, Sorkin and Boyle present a three-act story told in real time. In the moments before the product launches in 1984, 1988 and 1998, Jobs creates artifacts and emotional mosaics about the enigmatic geniuses who changed the world. Inherently inaccurate in its premise, Steve Jobs has the freedom to create a stunning portrayal of the Apple co-founder, delivering a career highlight performance from Michael Fassbender. Just as Sorkin's social network imagined Mark Zuckerberg as Charles Foster Kane on the set of Millennials, Steve Jobs has become the Rear King of Silicon Valley, abandoning his real daughter for three children in glass and aluminum (Macintosh, NeXT Cube, iMac). This must be looked at to fully understand its achievements. Watch Steve Jobs on Amazon. Crimson Peak (October 16, 2015) Guillermo del Toro finally directs the horror film again. That should really be enough to have your attention. But just in case, we also know that it is Del Toro back to Macabre and Gothic through Woothering Heights, Jane Eyre and even the 1946 Vincent Price hit Dragonwick. The story of a dark and mysterious new husbandIn the past, Crimson Peak would become much more literal in its name when young charismatic writer Edith Cushing (Mia Wasikowska) discovered the truth hidden by her new husband, Sir Thomas Sharp (Tom Hiddleston). Jessica Chastain also stars in this journey through fog and moors. See Crimson Peak on the Amazon. So there's a movie that comes with Steven Spielberg, the Coen Brothers and Tom Hanks. Do I need to go on? If so, I know that Bridge of Spies is a Cold War-era film based on the true story of lawyer James Donovan, played by Tom Hanks, and his journey to Soviet Russia to negotiate the released U-2 spy plane pilot Gary Powers. Last May, it was announced that Spielberg would write a draft of the film with Joel and Ethan Coen on board, marked Spielberg and Hanks' fourth collaboration as a director and actor. It really is a must-see definition. See the Bridge of Spies in the Amazon. Room (October 16, 2015) During most of the trip to the darkened theater, audiences are often helped with their enjoyment by the familiar trollope that conveys the friendliness and comfort of a short hand. But sometimes there are films that think outside the box that their personality and brilliance are qualities that must be celebrated and shared loudly. What makes the room special is that it does so while confining itself to four walls. Directed by Lenny Abrahamson, Emma Donogye's novel is a triumph that finds an unlikely emotional elation and a sheen of optimism in the darkest corners of the human experience. This is certainly the case with Brie Larson as a horse, a young woman kidnapped seven years ago by a man trapped in a converted tool. Her room is her life. But her despair is not ours, as she miraculously has reason to live by protecting the innocence of her son, Jack (Jacob Trembray). At just five years old, Jack still thinks room is all that exists in the world, and it's through his eyes that the story is told. So when the two finally leave the ordeal (nothing more than the dignity of their journey), it's a more surprising sensation than a big-budget space trip to the stars. Look at the Amazon room. BROOKLYN (November 4, 2015) One of the most remarkable films of 2015 was also one of the most beautiful and simple. Brooklyn tells the story of a young Irish girl's lonely journey across the Atlantic from home to America and into adulthood. But more than the adult story, this is a heartfelt reflection on maturity and the immigrant experience. Set in the early 1950s, Ellis's (played by Saoirse Ronan) story features a tone of authenticity from Nick Hornby's screenplay and director John Crowley's skillful touch. Ensmble cast including memorable productions of Emory Cohen, Domhnall Gleeson, Julie Walters and JimOnly increase the experience. But this is really Ronan's film, and she makes the transition to adult roles with a revelive performance as a young woman torn between the Old World and america's new life of upward mobility. The performance is intelligent and loving, like a movie, one of the most amazing and moving film experiences of the year. See Brooklyn on Amazon. Spotlight (November 6, 2015) Director Tom McCarthy points the lens at the Boston Globe's investigating arm, and what the spotlight revealed during the gruesome investigations in 2001 and 2002: The systematic cover-up and abuse of Boston's Catholic Church has caused more than 80 priests to molest or aggravate children without serious repercussions. McCrarking is miserable enough, and McCarthy take a brilliantly authentic approach to material with little way to sensationalize the material or quagmire it with award-friendly meacles. The result is an ensemble that accumulates combined talents in a quiet Tour de Force. No one is showing off, so everyone is able to tell this terrible story with proper shock. Michael Keaton, Mark Ruffalo, Rachel McAdams, Liev Schreiber, John Slattery, Brian D'Arcy James and Stanley Tucci make riveting productions of the film in the vein of all presidential men and zodiacs. Take a look at it soon and read our full review here. Watch the spotlight on Amazon. The Hunger Games: Mockingjay - Just like Part 2 (November 20, 2015), it's coming: The Last Adventures of Katniss Everdeen. The first part of The Hunger Games: Mockingjay is already getting through, but the real grand finale is still nearly a year away. In the culmination of four films and three books, Jennifer Lawrence's iconic heroine must go from the 13th arrondissement to the figurehead of resistance to actual leaders and warriors. This is not a game and there is no guarantee of a lone survivor. It will be an event where all of pop culture combines. Gail or Peeta? Everyone is there to see not only Panem, but the girl on fire engulf the nation. Click here for a review of Part 2. Watch Mockingjay – Part 2. Carol on Amazon (November 20, 2015) One of the best romantic films of the year is one ready to attract awards attention. Carol marks director Todd Haynes' latest foray into the postwar American world and, far from heaven, the HBO miniseries Mildred Pierce. Shot lavishly in a 16mm film, it's Haynes' most visually impressive effort to of all time, as felt by a young department store clerk (Rooney Mara) looking at a married New York socialite named Carol (Cate Blanchett). An overtly delicate carol, legied from Patricia Highsmith's novel The Price of Salt, has it allNot just Haynes' classy features, but his sense of immediacy and veness not seen in his previous efforts. More importantly, Blanchett and Mara not only give mesmerizing performances that illuminate a byt-bynead era of femininity, but also give repression because their romance is so forbidden by all those around them. This will be catnip for Oscar voters, but everyone else will have to be moved by the visual poetry of emotions drawn out by filmmakers and cast on screen. Macbeth (December 4, 2015) This version of the Scottish play continues to be one of the Bard's most difficult tragedies for filmmakers to tackle so far, so you have to have moviegoers ready to line up around the block. Despite romeo and Juliet, Hamlet, and at least a number of impressive film interpretations of Othello and two impressive film interpretations worth watching, Macbeth's film version does no justice to this ambition, hublis, and three giant witches who can see the movement of the tree. But the traditionally medieval setting for this 2015 iteration promises to pay visual allegiance to the original concept, and Michael Fassbender and Marion Cotillard as Uslar King and his hygiene wife are incredibly intrigued. It's nothing more than winning a spot on this list that won't be put out. See Macbeth on amazon. Youth (December 4, 2015) A meditative and deliberately opaque muse on the effects of art, life and aging, Youth is a highly self-aware testament to Paolo Sorrentino's human experience. But for whatever pretense the film might carry, it also enjoys a symphony of visual majesty expertly captured by cinemat guru Pahar Kabigazzi and a triumph of great performances from Michael Caine, Harvey Keitel and Jane Fonda. All three Thespians are likely to win big prizes, and Kane is particularly perfect as an understated, retouched composer who craves heartbreaking secrets. Keitel plays his filmmaking best friend, creating a funny, mercurial contrast. Sure, his performance is so big that he's only bombed out by Fonda as the ultimate form of the movie star diva. The film has a collection of other great supporting performances, including Paul Dano, but if it's a scathing Vinggett, it can only be added to a series of random performances. It's like life. Look at the young people on the Amazon. The Big Short (December 11, 2015) There have been a lot of movies about Wall Street lately, and it seems strange at first sight for Adam McKay to jump into that ring. But therein lies the fun of the film knowingly re-reading the ground trampled by the likes of Scorsese in a similarly fourth-wall breaking way. But rather than marvel at the decadent (and revolting) excesses of lifestyle, McKay's Big Short is much more focused. Attached to the terrifying contrast between handheld photos and inner monologue-shattering artifacts, the film is less than a morality storyA lesson on how the housing bubble burst badly in the mid-2000s. While the film is star-studded mainly for the convenience of the audience (there are many characters), the only person to shine is Steve Carell. He is certainly great as the only hedge fund manager who has left a modicum of decency. But a billion dollars with it will give you a coffee at the swap table. Equal parts comedy and horror, the film highlights how the nation has learned nothing while being the best educator in real boogiemen during an election season littered with fake things. Watch the Big Short on Amazon. Star Wars: The Force Awakens (December 18, 2015) Avengers and Katniss will undoubtedly be two of the biggest film events of 2015, but Star Wars remains a cultural event. At case-in-point, you probably couldn't stand one of the three previous Star Wars prequels. But the idea of another visit to that galaxy far away probably has as much giddy as C-3PO after an oil bath. This is because George Lucas touched endlessly fanciful and immediately iconic elemental entertainment in 1977. Disney will have more lightsabers, more X-wings, and definitely more open days in December willing to stake all our fantasies on Han, Luke and Leia. Mickey's right, J.J. Abrams is working on a pop culture sanctuary in The Force Awakens, and every geek, cinephile and kid of the last 40 years is there to testify in Amen! watch Star Wars: The Force Awakens on Amazon. The Hateful Eight (December 25, 2015) For a while, Quentin Tarantino's first full-fledged western didn't seem to happen after the script leaked online (to Hans Landa with rats!, but Tim Roth, Samuel L. Jackson, Kurt Russell, Michael Madsen, After a positive response to the script's live reading, including Bruce Dern, Tarantino decided to go ahead and film a near-Westerner triangle leading up to the real thing. First, Tarantino brought spaghetti aesthetics to Nazi-occupied France by Ingolious Busters, then fried it for a taste of Django Unchained and the South. Finally, we're getting a whole enchilada alongside the human Bologna side for The Hateful Eight, a QT version of the Wild Bunch to be shot in glorious 65mm (and will be the widest release of 70mm in more than 20 years!, distributed by the Weinstein Company, likely to be released around the same time as Django. In short, this is one holiday treat that should be high from a surprisingly eloquent gunman to a machismo and eloquent banter. Watch The Hateful Eight on Amazon. As of The Revenant (December 25, 2015), manyBirdman's later this year, but Alejandro Gonzalez Inarritu already has his next photo lined up, and it seems instantly convincing. A simple Western tale of what happens to the last man left for the dead, The Revenant imagines a 19th-century fur trapper named Hugh Glass (Leonardo DiCaprio). When Glass is killed by a bear and left to die in the woods by his companions robbing him of his miserable body, he survives his injuries against all odds so that he can just have his revenge. And soon, he's coming for the friends who left him in the woods, including Tom Hardy, Will Poulter and Domhnall Gleeson. They want to finish what the bear started, but we don't. Watch The Revenant on amazon. Joy (December 25, 2015) Usually, a film about Joy Mangano, the woman who invented the miracle mop, would not be one of the most expected films of any particular year. But usually, such assumptions don't attract A-list collaborations between director David O. Russell and star Jennifer Lawrence. The duo, who worked together on back-to-back Best Picture nominees Silver Linings Playbook and American Hustle, have earned both double nominations (and a win in Lawrence's case) and are going for a hat-trick in this Christmas Day release. Knowing Russell, they will make everyday mop stories into something deeply funny, inspiring, and definitely funny. Read our joy review here. See the joy on Amazon.
