In their home climate, they grow into relatively significant shrubs, unlike the limited sizes in our continental, dry climate. They are very flowery, maintenance-free shrubs that usually bloom from mid-spring to late spring. Sometimes variety names tell you what a plant looks like. The silver sword is a Japanese asalea with narrow, oval leaves that are green on the keira and almost white on the edges and have little imagination, they may look small to the swords. Pink flowers are of medium size and appear abundantly in May. It forms a shallow, sprawling and compact sling that does not need to be pruned to maintain a comfortable shape. We recommend growing it in a semi-sheath in areas 5 and 6. Japanese atsaleas need light, permeable soil that is sour, constantly moist (always keep atsaleas mulched) and moderately fertile. Use fertilizers only for rhododendrons and azaleas or ericaceous plants. The best soil mix is 1/3 peat, 1/3 leafy or lime-free and 1/3 soil from the hole where you plan to plant it. Azalea has shallow roots, so do not plant them too deep. This variety is reliably resistant to -23°C (USDA zone 6 or -26 °C when most of the leaves have fallen. Last update 15-02-2009 Does anyone know anything definite about the durability of the Silver Sword - including bud hardness? (The leaves are quite... but not enough to grow it if the buds freeze!). I saw it for sale here in zone 6... I looked at the note and it said area 7! Strange, I thought... And pointed it out to someone there who, of course, knew little and said something unsent. Poking online, I've seen quite different hardness listed. So maybe it hasn't been confirmed. Maybe I need to try it and see. But I wish some wise people here might know! [And since I "want" to grow it, answer something like: Oh, it blooms every year for me here in Zone 4! :)] (BTW, I'm going to use it for foundation seating around the front porch. So I can have a microclimate advantage there) Thanks from any info! The silver sword has interesting kirjavian leaves with a shallow flowering plant with red flowers that bloom in April. It's easy to find a place for this azalea. Its nice embroidery leaf offers a wonderful contrast to other plants in the garden. Developed in the late 1940s by Girards looking for stumbles, unsorted azaleas for landscaping and containers. This plant brightens any shady corner. Size in 10 years: Hardwood/Evergreen: Water requirements: Requirements:
