Bass pro tents reviews

Getting sponsored as a pro bass angler is an important step in establishing your reputation and career as a professional fisherman. Getting corporate sponsorship is also a great way to get paid to fish full time instead of having to rely on tournament prize money winnings. There are a lot of sponsors for pro bass anglers who compete often in fishing tournaments. Getting a business to sponsor you as a fisherman will require an impressive CV and some legwork. Research potential sponsors. Make a list of companies that make, or are associated with, fishing accessories. Watch fishing tournaments and note which companies are frequent sponsors. Although a bit unconventional, you may even include some companies that are not associated with fishing but which are nonetheless joint sponsors. Create a sponsor request package. This is like your portfolio and you should treat it as a PR package. Include your CV, highlighting fishing tournaments you've participated in, and how you've placed. Include your favorite picture of you and a great catch. Write the sponsorship letter. You want to include this as a cover letter for your PR package. In the first section, introduce yourself and offer some information about your background as a bass angler. Then make your pitch outline why the company you're contacting should sponsor you. What you sell is yourself and a business will only be interested in buying if you offer them a reason why you are a good investment. Tell them about the fishing tournaments you've been in and the ones that come up that you'll be competing in. Offer them benefits. If you write to a bait sales operation, for example, offer to give their bait at fishing expos and even to run a booth for them at events. Offer to wear a sweater or jacket with their logo and name on it. In addition, fishing sponsors want a sponsored fisherman who can act as a consultant for their business and analyze their products from the perspective of a professional consumer. Assure the company that their sponsorship will ensure advertising and advertising for them.
