Picture: shutterstock Do you think you know your quirky English expressions? The English language has one of the greatest vocabulary of any language, which means that there is more than a lot of room for things to become interesting. From metaphors and parables to puns, English is suitable for many creative phrases. Quite simply, English leaves plenty of room to play. The language is full of sayings, phrases and axioms that perform all sorts of functions. Some teach a lesson and others offer us colorful ways to express emotions and opinions. There are many phrases that have been used for decades or centuries and are knocking around for so long that no one knows exactly how they started. Some of these things have even changed over time, and the average English speaker has no idea what they used to mean. Many of the English expressions use animals to convey their points. These can be as common as pets and as exotic as the creatures that live in distant jungles. English has a place for them all, big and small! This means that all kinds of mutations could produce creatures that are slightly better adapted to a particular set of circumstances than their predecessors. The result is the speciation or development of new species. Given sufficient time and selective pressure, these creatures can become as different from each other as a virus to a chihuahua is a dolphin. In order to keep track of all different species, therefore, a substantial categorization is required, a discipline known as taxonomy. Poultry animals appear as a class within several different branches of the evolutionary tree. There are winged insects, a few winged mammals and of course many winged birds. Some of them are excellently recognizable and unfortunately unavoidable (mosquitoes, anyone?), while others are rare and special. Some use their wings to fly, while others use them primarily as a form of decoration or just for gliding. How well do you know this well-populated category of living beings? Do you know your birds from your bees and your aviators from your gliders? Take this quiz to see if you can name some of nature's most bizarre, wonderful and sometimes obscure creations! Copyright © 2021 InfoSpace Holdings, LLC, a System1 Company Image: Wiki Commons by JoachimKohler-HB Do you believe that cars have personalities? No, we don't mean like this Ford is happy or this Chevrolet is crazy. Rather, rather, based on their name? Think about it. Would a big, bad muscle car be perceived differently if it were a Dodge Kitten? Do you think you'd question the speed of a Chevrolet Cheetah? What if it was called a Chevrolet sloth? Things change, don't they? There is meaning in names, and not just for people. Automakers are struggling to choose just the right moniker for a vehicle. You have to consider brands, negative connotations of words or cumbersome translations and, quite frankly, the coolness factor. Does the name of a vehicle mean that it is robust, powerful, fast or luxurious? So it's no secret why automakers choose animals to represent their new rides. Nothing says speed like a roadrunner or a leopard. If you think of something unusual, your attention might be focused on a beetle or panda. You can equate robustness with a Ram or a Bronco. Nothing is sweeter than a bluebird or a rabbit. (OK, maybe the last two are bad examples.) Can you think of automakers who have turned to the animal kingdom to inspire their product line? Which four-legged creature has found its way into the back of your vehicle? From Barracudas to Wildcats, we have a wild list of cars named after animals. See how many you can catch! Copyright © 2021 InfoSpace Holdings, LLC, a System1 Company Picture: Buena Vista Images // J Getty Images It's a dog-eating-dog world out there, and dogs usually have it simply compared to most animals. It's hard to do it in the wild! You have to worry about the weather, find shelter, find food, habitat loss, hunters, predators, all sorts of things. It's not that easy to be a wild animal. That's why nature tries to ensure that the animals have a variety of skills and defenses to give them an advantage in the game of life. Some animals are super fast and can overrun a human. Some have jaws strong enough to crush bones. Some climb trees, some fly and others outperform each other when they get involved. Striped animals, for example, very often use their coloration as camouflage. And this can be used to hide from predators as often as it can be used to hide from prey. Some stripes warn you that an animal is dangerous; some may be useful for finding a partner. Some may not make sense that we understand at all. Be that as it may, there are many striped animals in the world. How many do you think you can identify? Time to find out!
