09-17-2010, 04:11 pm #1 So for those who click on this tab looking for choys, go back to the original video of AJ; P but I mostly post this theme to see if anyone has found or made tabs for the selected solo section in the song. Answer please so I can go spread this around on the comment section in the original video tutorial and video (spread not spam :P) * editing * since a lot of people have come to this topic, sick post a link to my other topic. It has tabs on the album version of the song. Editing by RawrGazzawrs 06-28-2011 at 05:48 PM. Reason: album version chooses my luna rock tab. Fingerpicking can be a bit difficult if you're just used to strumming the synies on your ukulele. This is my approach to getting you started with ukulele fingerpicking in a simple way. You will be set up and running in no time. It's easy when you know how ... For the purposes of this post and to keep it as simple as possible, we will stick with only one model use your thumb, forefinger, and middle finger. I've created some simple ukulele tabs below (if you don't know how to read ukulele tabs, top this so you can follow. No choys, fingerpicking practice To begin with, we won't use our fret hands so just to let it relax. I want you to take all your focus out of that hand. The tab above displays the G E A order and only repeats it. Your thumb will play G, your index finger plays E and your middle finger plays A. If you need it, here's my guide to help you know which string is, get your hands in a good position, put your fingers and thumbs on the wire that they'll be playing then just lift them out a little bit. That will give you a good starting position. Play slowly to begin, aiming for a steady tempo that keeps the distance between notes equal. Only increase your speed once you are completely comfortable. Introducing choys into fingerpickingSo once you're comfortable with the pattern and your chosen hand is doing what it should you start to introduce a few cho choes. Let's start with the ever popular C-ingy (third finger of the third fret, first string) playing the same pattern as before. This will be easy for you, but again go for pure consistency, let's try and add an F choys. Again this shouldn't have any trouble for you if you're comfortable with the models. Once you've got this solid, try and replace between C and F. Play through the models above for C and then immediately switch to F and play the model. Continue to alternate between the two. You'll probably find that initially you stammer a little at the point of shifting the syn sound. To combat this slow down the speed at which you can comfortably make changes and then speed the whole thing up as you get better. try fingerpicking some songs! Now you've got a simple fingerpicking ukulele model, applying it to some songs that you know cho choes for. Choose some songs that easily use 3-4 syming to get started and instead of strum them, fingerpick your way through using the patterns you've just learned. Here's a good song to try your fingerpicking on. More fingerpicking help! If you want some extra help with fingerpicking then I recommend taking a look at Terry Carter's Fingerstyle Mastery video course. You will learn 16 original fingerstyle pieces that will develop your skills and help you become a fingerstyle master. At $127 it's a great way to really focus on playing your fingerstle.
