Plant id cards

Jay Stanley and Barry Steinhardt are privacy public education coordinator and associate director, respectively, of the American Civil Liberties Union in New York and have allowed this piece to be posted on Computerworld.com's community pages. The terrorist attacks of 11 September have revived proposals for a national identity card system as a way to verify the identity of airline passengers and to prevent terrorists from entering the country. For example, Oracle Corp. Chairman and CEO Larry Ellison recently called for the creation of a national ID system and offered to provide the software for it at no cost. The latest calls for a national ID are just the latest in a long line of proposals that have surfaced repeatedly over the past decade, mostly in the context of immigration policy, but also related to gun control or health care reform. But creating a national ID card remains a misplaced, superficial quick fix. It offers only a false sense of security and will not improve our security, but it does pose serious threats to our civil liberties and civil rights. A national ID does not keep us safe or free. Reason 1: A national ID card system would not solve the problem that inspires it. A national identity card system will not prevent terrorism. It would not have thwarted the 9/11 hijackers, for example, many of whom allegedly had identification documents on them and were in the country legally. Terrorists and criminals will continue to be able -- with legal and illegal means -- to obtain the documents needed to obtain government IDs, such as birth certificates. Yes, these new documents will contain data such as digital fingerprints, but that will not prove a real identity -- only that the carrier obtained a fraudulent document. And their creation would not justify the cost to U.S. taxpayers, which, according to the Social Security Administration, would be at least $4 billion. It's an impractical and ineffective proposal -- a simplistic and naive attempt to use gee-whiz technology to solve complex social and economic problems. Reason 2: An ID card system will lead to a slippery slope of monitoring and monitoring of citizens. A national identity card system would not protect us from terrorism, but it would create a system of internal passports that would significantly reduce the freedom and privacy of law-abiding citizens. Once introduced, it is extremely unlikely that such a system would be limited to its original purpose. The original Social Security Law contained forbidden against using Social Security cards for unrelated purposes, but those constrictions have been routinely ignored and steadily abandoned over the past 50 years. A national ID system would threaten the privacy that Americans have always enjoyed and gradually increase the government and business community's control over citizens. used it. No. 3: A national ID system would require the creation of a database of all Americans. What happens if an ID card is stolen? What evidence is used to decide who gets a card? A national ID would require a government database of every person in the U.S. with constantly updated identifying information. It would probably contain a lot of errors, one of which someone can make unemployable and possibly much worse until he gets his file straightened. And once that database is created, its use would almost certainly expand. Law enforcement and other government agencies would soon ask to link to it, while employers, landlords, credit institutions, mortgage brokers, direct mailers, landlords, private investigators, civil litigants and a long list of other parties would begin seeking access, further eroding the privacy that Americans have always expected in their personal lives. Reason 4: ID cards would function as internal passports that would allow the government to control the movements of citizens. Americans have long had a visceral aversion to building a society in which the authorities can act like totalitarian sentries and demand, Your papers please! And that everyday intrusiveness would be merged with the full power of modern computer and database technology. When a police officer or security guard scans your ID card with, for example, his pocket bar code reader, will a permanent record of that check be created, including the time and your location? How long does it take for office buildings, doctors' offices, gas stations, tolls, subways and buses to include the ID card in their security or payment systems for greater efficiency? The result could be a country where the movements of citizens in their own country are monitored and registered through these internal passports. Reason 5: ID cards would promote new forms of discrimination and harassment. Instead of eliminating discrimination, as some have claimed, a national identity card would promote new forms of discrimination and harassment against anyone seen as looking or sounding foreign. That's what happened after Congress passed the Employer Sanctions provision of the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1985: widespread discrimination against foreign-looking American workers, especially Asians and Hispanics. A 1990 study by the General Accounting Office found that almost 20% of employers engage in such practices. A national identity card would have the same effect on a large scale, if Asians, Hispanics and other minorities were subjected to status and identity checks of the police, banks, traders and others. Not having a national identity card with them would probably be seen as a reason for the search, detention or arrest of minorities. The stigma and humiliation of constantly having to prove that they are Americans or legal immigrants would weigh heavily on such groups. Roads. © 2001 IDG Communications, Inc. This Intractable will show you how to get a handy stand for your iPhone for free using old ID cards or a plastic credit card-sized card. Divide the ID card into thirds and mark it with a pen. The pen will rub off so be careful. Also, you might have a little trouble marking the cards with a pen. Maybe you should get cunning with that. First fold the right most third back behind the rest of the card. Try to make the best crease you make. Then fold the left most third forward on the card. Again, make a good crease. Put your phone on the stand. Then mark with a pen or sharpie how much space you need for it. Then fold along that mark to create a space for the phone to sit in. Now you have a standard for your iPhone to watch movies or absolutely do something with it. This is my first Instructable so tell me if you like it! Thanks There are scenarios where it's wise to create an Apple ID without your credit card information. Of course, using an Apple ID, an iTunes account set up with a payment option on your iPhone, is useful when you want to quickly buy music and other audio content from the iTunes Store. At other times, however, you don't need to put your financial information on the Internet. An example is when you allow your children to download free content with their own account. Things like Audiobooks, podcasts, iTunes you and music apps for your phone are often free and therefore don't need a credit card. Refusing children the right to buy items from iTunes without your permission can help prevent busting the family media budget. When you create a new Apple ID, you'll be prompted to provide a payment method, such as a credit card, to complete the sign-in process. However, you can bypass this requirement by first selecting a free app from the iTunes Store: Tap the App Store icon on the main screen of the iPhone. Find a free app you want to download. A quick way to do this is to tap the Top Charts icon at the bottom of the screen, and then tap the Free Menu tab (at the top of the screen). Tap the Free button next to the app you want to download, and then choose Install App when the option appears. After selecting a free app to download you will see a pop-up menu appear. Tap the Create New Apple ID button. On the next screen, select the right country or region that matches your location. The default should already be correct, but if it isn't, just tap the Store option to change it. When you're done, tap Next. Read Apple's terms and conditions and privacy policies and tap agreement. Another in which you are asked to confirm your decision. Tap Agree again to continue. On the Apple ID and Password screen, tap the Email text box and enter the email address you want to use, and then tap Next. Choose a strong password for the account, tap Next, and then re-enter verify verify Box. Tap Done. Scroll down the screen to complete the Security Information section. Answer the three questions to continue your registration. Tap each question and in turn answer the question to complete the information. Use the Optional Rescue Email text box to provide an alternative email address in case you need to reset the account. Tap the Month, Day, and Year text boxes to enter your date of birth. If you set up the account for a child, make sure they are at least 13 years old to meet the minimum age requirement. Click Next to continue. On the Billing Information screen, tap the None as Payment Type option. Scroll down and fill in the remaining text boxes for your billing address and phone number. Tap Next. The last part of the sign-in process consists of verifying your account. You must now display a message on the screen alerting you that an email has been sent to the address you provided. To continue, tap the Done button. Check the email account to see if there's a message from the iTunes Store. If so, look in the message for a Verify Now link and click on it. Shortly after you complete enrollment, a screen will appear asking you to sign in. Type your Apple ID and password, and then tap the Verify Address button to complete the registration process. You must now be able to download music, apps, and other media from the iTunes Store for free with an account that has no payment information. Of course you can add this information if necessary at a later date. Don't select not to be a payment option if your address isn't in the country you're in. Pixabay You don't need to create a new Apple ID if you want to decline your financial information. Go to the settings app, select your name at the very top of the list, and then tap Pay & Send. Delete all payment modes currently on file. You don't delete a payment method if: You owe Apple somethingY You have an app subscription currently activeY family sharing settings prohibit it Thanks for letting you know! Tell us why! Why!
