Copyright © 2021 InfoSpace Holdings, LLC, a Facebook System1 company that launched Instant Games for Messenger just over a year ago, offers 20 20 at the beginning. Twelve months and the developers excited by the platform have eliminated custom versions of their popular games, expanding the number to 70. Celebrating the instant games' first birthday, the social media giant on Thursday, December 7 announced a number of new features, the most notable of which are live streaming to players who like to share their play content and engage in a small smack talk. It means that if you really have to show off your skills, you can now broadcast your game to friends and family in real time through Facebook Live. To do so, all you have to do is touch the camera icon in the upper right corner of the screen while you're playing a game, whether it's EverWing, Pac-Man, Arkanoid or one of the other 67 services. Once selected, you can choose the exact person to play and add a short description to interest viewers. To start a live stream, press the Start Live Video button and you're turned off. When you decide to end a live stream, the video will be posted to your Page or profile so that fans and friends who missed it can watch it later, Facebook explains on its website, adding that you can also delete it if you choose. While live streaming is now available, Facebook is also promising more for 2018, including the ability to play games alongside video chat. The hilarious feature will start with Words With Friends, so instead of just imagining your opponent's face when you put down a 100-point word that no one has ever heard of, you'll soon have the pleasure of seeing their reaction when they realize what you've done. Finally, other upcoming features for Instant Games include Rovio Entertainment's once hugely popular Angry Birds, with the Messenger version promising a fun new way to challenge friends. Other coming games include Sega's Sonic Jump, Disney Tsum Tsum from Line and a new normal puzzle game from GungHo Online, the producer of the hit game Puzzle & Dragons. Instant games and upcoming extras are all facebook's ongoing efforts to drive engagement with Messenger as well as Facebook, end the need to exit the platform to play games, or launch live events through other apps like Periscope. Integrating other Facebook features into Messenger like Facebook Live strengthens Facebook's critical ecosystem, drives engagement to include more eyeballs in more ads, and you've received it, generating more revenue for Facebook. Editor's recommendation Everyone has heard the term productivity and people talk about it about its high level and how to improve it. But few know how to measure productivity, or even exactly what we are saying when using the term productivity. In its simplest form, the productivity formula looks like this: ÷ input = Productivity. For example, your friend two sales people each make 10 calls to customers per week. One of the first averages 2 sales per week and one second averages 3 sales per week. By plugging in the numbers, we get the following level of productivity per sales person. For a sales person, the input is 2 sales and the input is 10 sales: 2 ÷ 10 = 0.2 or 20% yield. For two sales staff, the input is 3 sales and the input is 10 sales: 3 ÷ 10 = 0.3 or 30% yield. Knowing how to measure and dicte productivity is an invaluable asset to any manager or business owner in today's world. For example, in the above case, the sales #1 clearly not doing as well as the sales #2. Knowing this information, we can now better determine what course of action to take with our #1. Some of the results could probably be to require more internal training for that sales person or for them to go along with sales staff more efficiently to learn a better technique. It may be that sales #1 are just not suitable for sales and will do a better job in a different position. How to measure productivity with management techniques Know how to measure productivity that allows you to refine your business by minimizing costs and maximizing profitability: 1. Identifying long-term and short-term goals There is a good understanding of what you (or your company) goals are key to measuring productivity. For example, if your company's goal is to maximize market share, you'll want to measure your team's productivity by attracting new customers, not necessarily based on actual sales made. 2. Breaking the goal into weekly goals smaller than your long-term goal may be to get 1,000 new customers in a year. That would be 20 new customers per week. If you have 5 people in your group, each person needs to bring 4 new customers per week. Now that you've broken it down, you can track each person's productivity week by week just by plugging in the numbers: Productivity = number of new ÷ number of sales calls made 3. Create a system Have you ever noticed that whenever you walk into a McDonald's, the French fryer is always to your left? This is because McDonald's created a system. They have determined that the most effective way to set up a kitchen is to always have a French frying machine on the left when you step in. You can do the same thing and just adapt to your business. Let's say you know that your most effective sales person is selling the most between 3 and 7 p.m. If other sales people are working from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m., you could potentially increase productivity through something as simple as adjusting your work day. productivity measurement allows you to set up, monitor, and refine your system to maximize your input. 4. Reviews, reviews, reviews! We have been exposed to using these productivity figures to and track your employees, but don't forget to rate yourself using similar measurements. If you've set up a system to track and measure employee performance, but you still don't meet your goals, it may be time to consider your management style. After all, your management is a big part of the input side of our equation. Do you have more than one carrot or a kind of bar the manager? Maybe you can try more of the opposite type to see if that changes productivity. Managing your employees as a team? Perhaps taking a more one-on-one approach would be a better way to use each individual's strengths and weaknesses. Just remember that you and your management style contribute directly to employee productivity. 5. Using a Clear and Concise Target rating scale for each employee is an important part of any effort to increase productivity in the workplace. Once you've set goals or goals, it's important that your employees get regular feedback on their progress. Using a rating scale is a good way to provide a standardized visual representation of progress. Using a scale of 1-5 or 1-10 is a good way to give clear and concise feedback on an individual basis. It is also a good way to track long-term progress and growth in areas that need improvement. 6. Hiring Mystery Shoppers This is especially useful in retail activities where customer service is very important. A mystery shopper can give feedback based on what a typical customer is likely to experience. You can hire your own shoppers, or there are companies that will offer them to you. Regardless of which route you choose, it's important for mystery shoppers to have a standardized check list for their reviews. You can request a review for your employees to be friendly, how long it takes to welcome shoppers, employee knowledge of the product or service, and anything else important to retail activity. 7. Providing feedback forms Using feedback forms is a great way to get direct input from existing customers. There are only a few things to keep in mind when using feedback forms. First, keep the form short, 2-3 maximum questions with a space for any additional comments. Asking people to fill out a long form with multiple questions will significantly reduce the amount of information you receive. Second, keep in mind that customers are more likely to submit feedback forms when they're dissatisfied or have more complaints when they're satisfied. You can offset this trend by asking people to do a survey at the end of their interaction. This will increase compliance and provide you with a wider range of customer experiences, which will help when you are how to measure productivity. 8. Cost-effective tracking This is a great meat to take, especially if your employees have some decisions about their budget. They can track how much each person spends and how they spend compared to their productivity. Again, this is easy to plug into the equation: Productivity = the amount ÷ the amount spent. Having this information is very helpful in forecasting costs and budgeting. 9. Using self-assessment Ask your employees to do SELF-assessment can be a win-win for everyone. Studies have shown that when employees feel that they are involved and their input is taken seriously, morale improves. And as we all know, high employee morale turns into higher productivity. Using self-assessment is also a good way to ensure that the goals of workers and employers are appropriate. 10. Time management monitoring This is the number one killer in terms of productivity in the workplace. Time to browse the internet, play games, check email and make personal calls all contribute to a decrease in productivity. The secret is to limit these activities without becoming overbearing and affecting the spirit. Studies have shown that most people will adhere to rules that they feel are fair and apply to everyone equally. While ideally, we may think that none of these activities should be performed at company time, employees will almost certainly have a different opinion. From a productivity point of view, it's best to have policies and rules that are considered fair to both parties when you're learning to measure productivity. 11. Analysis of new customer acquisitions We've all heard the phrase that it's more expensive to get a new customer than it is to keep an existing customer. And while that's very true, in order for your business to continue growing, you'll need to constantly add new customers. Knowing how to measure productivity through new customer acquisitions will ensure that your marketing dollars are being spent as efficiently as possible. Here's another meat that easily plugs into the formula. Productivity = the number of new ÷ of the money spent to get those customers. For example, if you run any type of ad campaign, you can compare your future results and spending bases accordingly. Let's assume your total advertising budget is $3,000. You put $2,000 into TV ads, $700 on radio ads, and $300 on print ads. When you track your results, you find that your TV ad has generated 50 new customers, your radio ads have generated 15 new customers, and your print ad has created 9 new customers. Let's plug those numbers into our equation. Television produced 50 new customers at a cost of $2,000 (50 ÷ 2000 = 0.025, or a yield ratio of 2.5%). Radio ads generated 15 new customers and cost $700 (15 ÷ 700 = 0.022 or a 2.2% productivity rate). Collected print ads 9 new customers and cost 300 dollars (9 ÷ 300 = 0.03 or 3% return on yield). From this analysis, it is clear that you will get the biggest bang for advertising dollars using print ads. 12. Use peer-to-peer feedback This is especially useful when people work in groups or groups. While self-assessment can be very helpful, the average person is notoriously bad at evaluating their own abilities. Just ask a room full of people how many people consider themselves an above-average driver and you'll see 70% of hands go up! We now know well that in reality about 25% of drivers are below average, 25% are above average, and 50% are average. Are all these people lying? No, they just don't have an accurate assessment of their own abilities. It's the same at work. Using peer-to-peer feedback will often provide a more accurate assessment of a person's abilities than self-assessment. 13. Encouraging innovation and not penalizing failure When it comes to productivity, encouraging employee input and applying their ideas can be a great way to increase productivity. Just make sure that any changes you apply will turn into higher productivity. Let's say someone comes to you asking for an entertainment budget so they can take potential customers golfing or go to dinner. By using simple productivity figures, you can easily create a cost benefit analysis and extend the program to the rest of the sales team, or terminate it altogether. Either way, you've gained valuable knowledge and boosted morale by including employees in the decision-making process. 14. Using an external reviewer using an external reviewer is the culmination of objective evaluation. Companies that provide professional assessments use highly trained personnel even specializing in specific industries. They will design a full analysis of your business's productivity level. In their final report, they will make recommendations and recommendations on how to improve productivity. While the benefits of a professional review are numerous, their costs make them prohibited for most businesses. Final thoughts These are just a few of the things you can do when learning how to measure productivity. Some may work for your particular situation, and some may not. The most important thing to remember when deciding how to track productivity is to choose a method that fits your goals. Once you've made up your decision on that, it's just a matter of constantly monitoring your progress, making small adjustments, and analyzing the results of those adjustments. The business world is changing rapidly and having the right tools to track and monitor your productivity can give you an edge over your competitors.
