Whether you're on a one-woman show or running thousands of businesses, working for the hottest tech startups or a lesser-known niche industry, strong communication skills are crucial to your success. Naturally, you aspire to be a top-notch communicator. So here is the million dollar question: Is English your mother tongue? If the answer is yes, you may need some work to improve your communication skills. Although English is a global business language, native English is often disadvantaged. They are usually misunderstood because non-native speakers have problems following along. While this may be a problem for those who communicate only with their native English counterparts, it is becoming rarer. U.S.-based companies of all sizes now contract goods and services from non-native English worldwide. Few native English speakers go on to learn another language. This means that they have limited experience not only in learning languages, but also speaking. For them, English is English. If only that were true. Anyone who speaks English, including non-native residents, speaks in different tastes, depending on how they have learned and how well. Believe it or not, a group of non-native English speakers often understand each other well. That's when an American or British person walks into a room that problems begin, the BBC explains. Their deep level of language knowledge really puts them at a disadvantage. They can use words that are completely lost to their audience. When words such as spin back and synergy enter the conversation, it. For others, you may also be speaking another language entirely. Here are a few more reasons why you should customize your communication style so that anyone with whom you have business can understand what you're saying. If you have spoken only one language all your life, it is clear that you have had a lot of practice. What may not be as obvious as how fast you speak. Phrases and thoughts naturally come to you in English, and they come out of your mouth just as quickly. All the time your non-indigenous colleagues can only find it difficult to keep up. Native English... there is only one who may not feel the need to adapt or adapt to others, communication skills and intercultural coach Chia Suan Chong told the BBC. Non-native speakers tend to speak more slowly and choose their words more carefully so as not to misunderstand. Also, stop mumbling. Articulate pronunciation earns you extra points. If you've never learned another language, you can't empathize with how difficult it is to understand idioms, humor or informal language. You may be more inclined to use words that leave your audience completely and completely confused. Non-natives will most likely avoid misleading phrases for two reasons. Either they don't know these idiosyncrasies in English because they haven't learned them yet, or they just choose not to use them in business conversations because they want to make things too confusing. They know that everyone can not fully understand the meaning of these nuanced words, so they adhere to a simple language that everyone can understand more easily. Even if you don't have the time, energy or money to learn another language, you can significantly improve your English communication skills so that everyone understands better. Rule No 1: Keep it simple, stupid. This does not mean that you should speak painfully slowly or talk to non-native English, as if they were children. Instead, remove unnecessary jargon from your conversation to eliminate the possibility of confusion. In meetings, watch who makes all the speeches. Is that you? Then cool the nozzles. Invite others to participate. It may take a few more moments for non-native English to gather your thoughts. Sit firm and resist the desire to fill the silence with your mind. There is a good reason why you are in dialogue together, and it is important to hear what they have to say. In summary, stop talking a million miles per hour and slip jargon gibberish into every conversation. Your business offers can just rise abruptly when people can finally understand the meaning of your words. After the game, Erin Andrews usually has 30 seconds to learn something worthwhile. Borrow her trick, and you'll be more productive at work and know what's more effective. BE DIRECT If you are probing information, skip a small talk. I don't have time at the roundabout says Andrews. I cut into the chase pretty darn fast. And it works not only on television, but also in finding a job, making connections behind the scenes and conducting pre-interviews before the camera starts rolling. Find out what you need, and ask it to be empty. SLOW DOWN Many times in the interview, you see this: How did it make you feel, and what did you do about it afterwards? Don't do that. If you ask two questions at a time, you only get one answer, says Andrews. So if you interview a potential hiring or trying to gain a better understanding of your clients' needs, ask one pointed question, wait for an answer, and then take further action. PLAY DUMB If the answer feels like a blow, ask Why? They can say: We're just going to play broncos ball. Andrews will ask: What is it? They will answer: This is just how we are taught. She'll say, Explain this because I don't know what that means. Try if someone feeds you an unsatisfactory explanation of the office screw. You will find out where the breakdown really takes place.
