Barbie doll poem explanation

If I, as a child, knew that my Barbie hair might look as good as a doll's Instagram account in @welovetheroyaldolls, I would have had fewer puppets forced into premature retirement after a session with my scissors left them with the whistles. Or, at least, I might have had Barbie with hair that fits my texture. An account run by Brazilian artist Rafinha Silva garnered millions of views on the video in which he showcases how he takes dolls from basic to total baddies. In one video, which currently has over 1.6 million views, Silva darkens the blonde doll roots, adds curly extensions to the song track, and even mixes a leave-out. He uses a tool that looks like a tiny curling wand to get the perfect reel. In other posts, he turns dolls into characters like Harley Quinn, Little Mermaid, and celebrities like Cher. Don't let a 60-second transformation video fool you. Silva told Allure in an email that it can take an average of about 16 business days to accommodate each doll. Most of the dolls you see on his Instagram are made to order and cost $154 USD. Silva's favorite part is not even hair! The part I love most about customizing is eyebrows and eyelashes – I love eyelashes, he explained. Silva, who has never studied cosmetology, says his work pays the bills despite his lack of formal training. The Royal Dolls are my main source of income. Before working with dolls, I was a journalist. It was a long time my greatest passion. Okay, so he's a former journalist who can now kill the cut and paint. Meanwhile, I can barely get my twist-outs together. Proving that teamwork makes the dream work, Silva, who started with the style of the doll himself, now employs some help. For a long time I was a complete company. Today, I have incredible professionals who help me. I have a super creative head that makes all the clothes unique dolls. [I have someone] in charge of digital art, creating new packaging for dolls. I [team] most of the company, [doing] social networking, the creation, development and delivery of products to the carrier. I am seriously impressed with the care and details that go into creating these dolls. I'd love to dish out money to get one out in my resence – or, perhaps even one that looks like Beyoncé. More great hair we love: Now, learn how to get an '80s Barbie doll makeup look: Keep up with the latest daily buzz with buzzfeed daily newsletter! Daily Health posted an article recently about the call for Mattel masses to produce a bald Barbie doll for cancer patients and girls who have lost their hair. I'm a Barbie fanatic. She is the same age as me and I still have my first Barbie doll. In fact, friends still buy me Barbie dolls as gifts. As the ultimate girly girl growing up, playing with Barbie was my favorite activity. I loved building her and learned how to Sew, making dresses for her. The concept of bald Barbie is not new to me, however. Another doll that I had as a little girl was naked. I'm sure she had to knock off, but at seven and eight years old, I wouldn't have known that. She came with several wigs, and I enjoyed brushing them and trying new hairstyles. When I lost my hair during chemotherapy, I thought about this doll often while I was buying three wigs I used to cover my bald head. Naked Barbie is a great idea while you give wigs. Naked can be beautiful, but many of us like the possibility of hair. When my niece was diagnosed with childhood leukemia at the age of four, she lost her hair during treatment. She refused to wear a wig or even cover her head most of the time. When the treatment was over and she was out and about sporting all her head of hair, people noted how wonderful it was that she had such lovely hair. One bank case commented to her that she remembered how cute she looked without hair, but more importantly how wonderful it was that she was good again. After that precious little girl expressed her excitement by asking my sister, How could you take me from naked like that, Mom? My sister was ridiculed and had to remind my niece that it was she who refused to cover up. Maybe Bald Barbie will encourage little girls to be as brave as my little niece without regret. Indeed, though, do we really have Barbie to be good to be naked? As nice a gesture as it is for Mattel to produce a naked diva and present little sick girls with him, women my age are still trying to come to grips with the fact that we don't grow up to have Barbie's. This is even more troublesome for those of us who lost breasts we had breast cancer. If Mattel really wants to help cancer patients, maybe they can start with Mastectomy Barbie. In fact, boobless Barbie could enhance the self-esteem of a whole new generation of women in so many ways. It included a hair styling gel and hair accessories so you could give her a drybar-level look in your bedroom. But you probably don't want to mess with her hair these days – this vintage Barbie is being sold for as much as $160 on eBay right now. 2 Pink Splendor Barbie (1996): A $339 sky high hairstyle is a cherry on top of this extravagant Barbie, of which there are only 10,000 in the world. Released in 1996, Pink Splendor Barbie is the most expensive retail Barbie ever, originally priced at a whopping $900. If you're inclined to buy this collector item now, though, you can find him on Amazon for only $339! 3 Pink Jubilee Barbie (1989): $800 to celebrate Barbie's 30th anniversary, this Pink Jubilee doll was gifted to guests at mattel celebration in New York centre in 1989. Her fun '80s outfit features a pale pink and silver dress, sparkly earrings and large, wavy hair. You can have one of your own for $800 on eBay. 4 Devi Kroell Barbie (2010): $1075 With her thigh high gold boots and chic pink purse, it's clear that Mattel paired with a big time designer to make this fashionable Barbie. This designer would be Devi Kroell, known for her luxurious Italian-made handbags, and the doll was sold for $1,075 during a charity auction by the Council of Fashion Designers in America. 5 Marie Antoinette Barbie (2003): $1,250 If you're a history buff who bought the 2003 Marie Antoinette Barbie, you may want to consider separating with it. Dressed in an elaborate French inspired dress, this elegant Barbie is now being auctioned up from $1,250 on eBay. 6 Lorraine Schwartz Barbie (2010): $7,500 Jewelry designer Lorraine Schwartz, whose creations are worn by celebrities like Jennifer Lopez and Beyonce, is behind this gorgeous redhead Barbie. It sold at auction for $7,500, which sounds a whole lot until you note that Barbie jewelry alone – including a tiny diamond encrusted B on her waist – was actually valued at over $25,000. 7 Original Barbie (1959): $27,450 Released in 1959, the first time Barbie doll features gold hair, a black and white swimsuit and blue eyeshadow. Although it's rare Barbie is about worth $8,000, the mint condition doll is sold at auction for $27,450. According to the Richest, you can tell if you are the first edition model, checking holes at the bottom of her feet - the second edition was solid feet. 8 De Beers 40th Anniversary Barbie (1999): $85,000 To celebrate Barbie's 40th anniversary, Mattel paired with De Beers to outfit this glamorous doll. Along with a full length sheer skirt, gold bikini top and matching mandarin wrap, this doll has a rocking belt that offers 160 diamonds from the big-name jewel company. She was sold for $85,000. 9 Stefani Canturi Barbie (2010): $302,500 This elegant blonde doll is the most expensive Barbie ever sold. Designer Stefano Canturi designed her necklace, which featured emerald-cut Australian pink diamonds, a carat piece, surrounded by three carat glittering white diamonds. At auction, it sold for a significant $302,500. But there's a feel good end to this story: the doll was actually set up to raise money for the Breast Cancer Research Fund. You will need good scissors, needle and threads (or sewing machine, ) small snaps or buttons, lots of ribbons, lace and Scrap and Barbie or another doll to simulate! I'm in a three piece outfit, so I'll start with the first piece. I cut out a white rectangle that put it up and add a small snap, then I sew the lace skirt at the bottom and turn it out, I stitched the edges together, leaving a small space between where the seams end and where the affection is. Now for the second piece. This time I cut out the trapezoidal (I cut it in length so you can see the lace skirt from below.) and hemmed it all the way around and sewn on the ribbon. The third piece, the bodice. I cut out this piece in a little shape, and shaped it over as I went along to make it fit snugly. I hemmed the top and side, and added a snap at the top. (the bottom should tuck the skirt.) Then I collected one side of about an inch wide strips, sleeves and seised them. I also added a small flower bodice. It's just how I make one doll that fit, so be creative and have fun! Barbie is adding a new hobby to her resume: she joins girl scouts. As dolls roll out in stores this week, real-life scouts can also earn Barbie Be anything, doing an all-participatory patch for the first time girl scouts have ever worked with a corporate sponsor. And, as you can expect, some consumer groups are upset about the partnership, saying that putting an unrealistically perfect Barbie in a healthy uniform sends a bad message. Barbie is basically a terrible role model for girls, and she is not about what Girl Scouts principles are, which are related to leadership and courage, Susan Linn, a psychologist and direct campaigner for a marketing-free childhood, told today. Both Girl Scouts and Mattel stand by the young doll, saying that Barbie inspires young imagination and encourages girls to follow their dreams. In fact, earlier this year, Mattel released entrepreneur Barbie, and earlier the doll is everything from presidential candidate firefighters. It seems only natural that she will don a green patch-covered vest after all. However, the debate continues. If girl scouts feel the new doll fits their ideals, why can't that be good enough for everyone else? As a child, I often play with Barbie dolls. I'm not looking for a sample; I just saw it as an opportunity to invent new characters and stories with my sister. Toys allowed our imagination to bloom. (We were both Girl Scouts at that time, and I'm sure we would have loved to dress our dolls like we did.) For the little ones who are not involved in the research program, this new doll will raise awareness of the organization. If it encourages young people to look at girl scouts and learn more about leadership and courage, then really, what's wrong? That's not to say that none of the concerns are legitimate. I understand the concern about product placement in front of young children, and of course I've never seen such a stylish Girl Scout uniform in real life. But let's face it: little girls are going to continue playing with Barbie dolls. If my 5-year-old niece develops an interest in becoming a Daisy Scout after picking up one of these toys, I'd say that good far outweighs the bad here. Tell us: You buy a Girl Scout Barbie doll? What will be your child's career? Is?
