Innocence in the interpretation of concepts by children is nevertheless lost on most adults who often use metaphors in their conversations with children and expect them to understand their meaning. Langston experiences this kind of lapse in adult judgment when his aunt told him that Jesus would come down in the form of bright light to utter his salvation that he literally and expectedly understood during the prayers of salvation in their city. His interpretation later led to many struggles and sacrifices on his journey to salvation. The main character struggles to understand why Jesus did not come during the prayer of deliverance as he was ready to be saved, concluded that perhaps Jesus did not love him enough to give him salvation like other children who rose during prayers as they were saved. Langston also struggled to understand why the sentence was not imposed when he and his best friend lied about seeing Jesus, therefore, saved and at the head of the stage, while Christian morality was told that lying led to punishment. He also struggled with guilt that he lied specifically to his aunt that he had been saved, resulting in him crying as he stood, which the others interpreted as the work of the Holy Ghost. The consequence of His actions further strengthened the faith and belief of others in Jesus. The most important lesson the reader gets from the narrator's struggles is that you always stand your seat in what you believe in instead of engaging in actions to please others that result in internal turmoil and adversity, as well as seeking clarification whenever something is unclear. The theme and the doctrine of salvation The book presents a theme of cynicism and anxiety that is evident even though the narrator conveys in his initial tone that he will take a cynical and skeptical position. The author says through the narrator: I was saved from sin when I was thirteen. But he wasn't really saved. In a sentence, the author the tone of cynicism though the book. The narrator's feelings are conveyed that they are unsure of the state of his salvation. Feelings of doubt were triggered by the pressure and circumstances to which the narrator underwent when going through the process of salvation. It is vital that someone is safe as they make certain life-changing decisions such as salvation, so no doubt they should be in the equation. Hughes also raises a timid theme. In the Bible, the relationship with God is described as of great importance and should be very certain of this because there is an even greater relationship of marriage. The narrator still had problems with his salvation, so timid whether or not the morals of the book will confess: Salvation should not be forced on someone, especially adolescents, because they undergo a lot of changes during this stage in their life and are bound to get more confused about life. Salvation is often defined as the deliverance of a person from sin and the consequences of those sins. This is a process in which man devotes himself to the Lord emotionally, mentally, and spiritually. It is, therefore, a decision that greatly presses and changes life. Therefore, the decision should be taken solely by an individual without influence or coercion by external forces in order to avoid the consequence of one questioning their spirituality, which could ultimately lead to a deduce belief in Jesus and God. Throughout the book, the author uses images to ensure that the reader is shrouded in different scenes regarding their feelings, touch and sound. There are various examples of images used by the author that include; Wesley and I were surrounded by sisters and deacons praying. (Hughes, 2000 film) This example of the use of images by the author is to force us to put ourselves in a situation where the child should have understood why he feels pressure to make the decisions he has made. The preacher preached a wonderful rhythmic sermon, all the reclamations and shouts and the solitary cries and terrible images of hell. in this sentence, the author's image paints an image that helps the reader connect with the reason for the sudden change in Langston's belief and decides to do what was expected of him during the process of salvation The author also uses images in a scene in which Langston weeps before the entire congregation. He uses this form of image to develop confusion caused by this action where members think his action is due to the work of the Holy Ghost, while his reasons for the aforementioned scene were very different. The paper quoted Hughes, Langston. Salvation. (2002). (2002).
