Every year I use the U.S. Open as my little testing ground for the latest digital cameras. I don't go to tennis. I'm not a big fan of the game; teenagers in short shirts and fluorescent clothing hall didn't do it for me. I go because, like a lab testing camera, Open has a game, set and match. Corners from pit press, courtside and midcourt schmoozer schmoozer the cabs turn even lame shooters like me - for at least one day - into the grandfather of all sports shutterbugs, Walter looss Jr. With this kind of access and equipment, you just can't miss it, says Jim Sugar, a freelance professional photographer for Sports Illustrated who gives looss a run for his acting shooting money. This year, the news in the cameras is cheap, digital, single-lens reflex blocks. Single-lens cameras are the ultimate photographer's tool. They are portable, fully automatic and, best of all, allow you to see exactly what the camera sees. The mirror reflects the image directly from the focal point in the back of the lens to your eye. Don't guess what's where, both at pedestrian points and shoot units. The only problem with single-lens cameras has always been the price. The simple point and shoot units were enough for the average Jane to capture the magic of digital photography. Most sane people (a group that certainly doesn't include me) will never drop the few thousand dollars he used to catch a digital single-lens camera. But no more than that. Thomas Hogan, an independent analyst for the photo and electronics industry, estimates sales of digital single-cell reflective cameras will grow by about 30% in 2006, to nearly 5.2 million units. And major suppliers like Canon (CAJ) - Get The Report, Nikon, Olympus (OCPNY) , Sony (SNE) - Get the report and others drop prices on one lens with abandon to fill this demand: Expect a solid mid-market digital single-lens camera like the Canon 350DX or Nikon D50 to be below $500 by the holidays. It's a ton of cameras for money, enough to lure even the most budget camera buyer to the superior qualities of a single-lens reflex camera. To get an idea of the explosion of the digital single dollar, I compared the new Olympus E-330 ($999, body only) to the top-line Canon EOS-1D IIN ($3,999 body only) - check out B'H Photo to purchase information. Almighty OlympusFirst, Olympus. It's a question of what the E-330 doesn't have, not what it does. All the high-quality features that were once strictly pro-only here: fully automated focus and exposure, interchangeable bayonet lenses, automatic integrated flash, a full set of controls, three frames per second exposure and a full range of presets for different shooting situations. The E-330 even comes with a 2.5-inch preview screen diagonal, like the kind you'll find at point-and-shoot cameras. Very smooth. The image quality of the E-330 and the overall usability are solid. At the start of the match, Olympus beautifully captured Rafael Nadal's gruesome outfits in their full crimson flush. (Who is wearing this child?) The camera also had a lot of speed. On a long 300-millimeter lens, Nadal at 120 The serve was frozen in time, just before it nearly blew me in the head while I was down in the press pit. On the match for the outside court Justin Gimelstob against David David I checked Olympus' other lenses. The camera is handled wide-angle and the portrait work beautifully. I had nothing but waiting for Gimelstob to do something worth filming, which took a while. He's a basic guy. It just stands there and explodes away. Charge the net, please, right? Canon Ball RunNext, the Canon. EOS 1D IIN is the best in the top line of digital cameras to capture action. The device limits the resolution to relatively light 8 megapixels; Other cameras in this price range have insane 16 megapixel resolution, if not more. But Canon can run at 8.5 frames per second with nearly 45 exposures, a pace as blistering as Nadal's serve. Canon comes in full metal and rubber housing that can be mistaken for gym weight. And the device has every conceivable function: full video outputs, hundreds of control settings, a 2.5-inch bright liquid crystal screen. Nevermind that I missed the rest of the match Serena Williams because I couldn't figure out how to work the thing. Or that I was asked to hold on from the outside match court because I did too many scenes still trying to figure out how to work the thing. Or that it took most of the rest of the day to finally figure out how to work the thing. Because when do I figure out how to work Canon? Oh, baby, what a camera. Canon EOS is the 82nd Airborne Assassin Images: there's a Canon in hand, you bag your shot. It's that simple. I couldn't travel to EOS. At 30 feet, 60 feet, 150 feet it was all dead at focus of impact. I even got a full shot of Chris Everett at CBS Booth. The shot would have been a cunning, blurry mess on most rigs, but not Canon - it was as if Chris was standing next to me. Now, cost aside, these cameras are not without their problems. Mass is a big problem. Even the relatively lightweight Olympus weighs almost two pounds with lenses. And the canon? Forget it. Expect to haul about 10 pounds of camera, lenses and other accessories. These cameras are a commitment to bear. But who cares? The Olympus E-330 is a terrific camera for money. If you are looking for a decent gift this Christmas, consider it. But if you want a terrific camera, without compromise I'm going to get that shot at anything, then Canon is for you. Personally, I can't think of a better way to spend a few thousand dollars - at least for now. Enjoy the good life? Email us with what you would like to see in future articles.
