Remember to keep the charades ones that are relatively easy to operate off and well known. Anything too unusual will be difficult to operate And guess and the kids might get bored or disappointed when you have a good list of words, the game game is quite simple. Splitting into teams will make it more competitive, or just take turns. One person chooses a word or phrase (from those you just wrote) to act and other players guess what they're acting. As you can't speak, there are measures for mime that have some clues. If the word or phrase is a book, put your hands together and open like opening a book. To show a person, stand on your hips with your hands. For a song, pretend you're singing. For a movie, you turn in front of your face like operating an old camera. Draw a rectangle with your fingers for a TV show. If it's a phrase, hold your fingers to show the number of words. Put your finger and thumb close together to represent a small word like a or the;. Move them away from each other for a very long word. Touching your ears shows the word sounds like another, easier to act off the word. Some examples of some of the charades are easy to operate off: bananas: the baby can stand up and suggest it is a meal by placing his hand towards his mouth. Then they can pretend to peel the sides of the banana, then bite imaginarily. Swimming: The child can use arm movement to mimic swimming strokes. They can also make a splashy motion to show water or waves. Superman: The child can stand on his buttocks with his hands to show he's a person. They can then put their hands in the flight position in front of them. They can also make the letter S in the air or on their chest. M.A.D. Teaching English
