It is a Nordic country; they have cold weather, they have a cold heart. Cold; storm; wild beasts in the forest. It's a tough life. Their houses are built of logs, dark and smoky inside. There will be a raw icon of the virgin behind a gutter candle, the leg of a pig hung up to heal, a chain of drying mushrooms. A bed, a stool, a table. Hard, short and poor lives. For these upland loggers, the devil is as real as you or me. All the more so; they have not seen us or even know that we exist, but the devil they often see in cemeteries, these dark and touching townships of the dead where the graves are marked with portraits of the deceased in the naïve style and there are no flowers to put in front of them, no flowers grow there, so they put small offerings votive , buns, sometimes a cake that bears come to wood from the margins of the forests to tear. At midnight, especially on Walpurgisnacht, the Devil organizes picnics in cemeteries and invites witches; then they dig up fresh corpses, and eat them. Anyone will tell you. Garlic wreaths on the doors guard the vampires. A blue-eyed child born first foot in the night of St. John will have a second view. When they discover a witch - an old woman whose cheeses ripen when her neighbors don't, another old woman whose black cat, oh, sinister! follows her pretty much all the time, they strip the crone, looking for its marks, for the supernumerary nipple that his pet sucks. They find him fast. Then they stoned her to death. Winter and cold. Go visit Grandma, who's been sick. Take her the oatcakes I cooked for her on the heart and a little jar of butter. The good child does what his mother offers - five miles of trudge through the forest; don't leave the way because of bears, wild boar, hungry wolves. Take your father's hunting knife; you know how to use it. The child had a layer of sheepskin to keep the cold, she knew too well the forest to fear it, but she must always be on her guard. When she heard this chilling howl of a wolf, she dropped her presents, grabbed her knife and turned to the beast. It was a huge, red-eyed and running, graying chops; anything but the child of a mountaineer would have died of dread at the sight of it. He went for her throat, as do the wolves, but she did a big sweep to her with her father's knife and slashed his right wading pool. The wolf let out a sip, almost an ear, when he saw what had happened to him; wolves are less courageous than they look. He went off disconsolately between the trees as well as he could on three legs, leaving a trail of blood behind him. The child wiped the blade of his own knife on his apron, wrapped the wolf's paw in the cloth in which his mother had packed the oatcakes and headed for his grandmother's house. Soon he came on snow so thick that the path and all the steps, track or spoor that could have been on it were obscured. She found that her grandmother was so sick that she had taken to her bed and fell into a restless sleep, moaning and shaking so that the child guessed she had a fever. She could feel the forehead, it was burning. She shook the cloth of her basket, to use it to make the old woman a cold compress, and the wolf's paw fell to the ground. But it was no longer a wolf's paw. It was a hand, cut off on the wrist, a hardened hand at work and freckles with old age. There was a wedding ring on the third finger and a wart in the index finger. By the wart, she knew it for her grandmother's hand. She recoiled the sheet, but the old woman awoke to this, and began to struggle, howling and howling like a possessed thing. But the child was strong, and armed with his father's hunting knife; she managed to hold her grandmother long enough to see the cause of her fever. There was a bloody stump where his right hand should have been, already festering. The child crossed and screamed so loudly that the neighbours heard her and rushed in. They know the wart on the hand both for the nipple of a witch; they drove the old woman, in her shift as she was, in the snow with sticks, beating her old carcass to the edge of the forest, and bombarded her with stones until she fell dead. Now the child lived in his grandmother's house; it prospered. Teksten herover er and uddrag fra webbogen. Kun medlemmer kan lse hele indholdet. Fe adgang up to hele Webbogen. It's a little Red Riding Hood story and how here the encounter with the wolf happened and happened. A big difference is that there are more explanations of what the world is like during the infamous hike to Grandma's house. It is a cold world with witches and other evils that abound. There is a fight to lessen this evil by killing the witches so the devil who uses these witches as links to develop his power. It is a difficult life during this period and it must be even more difficult to live in the woods if evil beings collect corpses to be eaten at picnics. This extra background added a darkness to the story that some might not be familiar with, but I really liked it as it seems to build from the feel of the Grimm in a more modern time. In truth, the rest of the story was incomplete. (spoiler view) [Especially when it comes to Grandma. She kind of has the power to turn into a werewolf, but she's a witch... Is it some kind of curse thrown at her or some power that she has of the devil? (hide spoiler)] It would have been nice if the problem with Grandma was clarified. The point of view of this story is one where I feel that we know almost nothing about red riding hood or grandma, which could explain why we buy into history so easily wanting to know what will happen. Definitely think that Red Riding Hood is extremely difficult and deserved to get property for everything she went through. That said, there is some doubt as to whether his story is the truth. Red Riding Hood won a lot thanks to the death of his grandmother with hardly any proof of his claims to be attacked by a wolf. Personally, I wonder what really happened that day and night in the woods. Interesting story, but ultimately not for me; pretty sure I'd forget it after the time spent, but right now it's sitting with me and makes me analyze what could really happen. I might love the whole news collection more than just this story, but I'm not in the greatest of hastes to find it and read it. If you are interested in reading an author who has influenced Neil Gaiman and other contemporary supernatural authors today, then give this author and the new one a shot. ... More tell several known stories that are easily recognizable (werewolves, legends and folk tales, Little Red Riding Hood, classic witches) all rolled into one with a bit of a gorey ending. I was given this news to read as material for an English phonetics course and led to a lot of discussion about content and the end has several interpretations ... A nice and quick read. March 08, 2020 Max Russell noted that he really liked, I love the way the frame is built in this story, and how this gothic text completely subverts the archetypal damsel in distress so prevalent in its genre. The writing uses a range of interesting techniques, and makes an interesting reading, especially with regard to the context of the author and the social climate in his time of production. On July 10, 2018, Kest Schwartzman noted that he really liked a fairly typical re-take on the red hood, but narrated in a perfect sparse language, well suited to the content. He crawls at you, even if you know where he's going.
