In the last decade, we have seen an explosion in the variety of coffee-making devices available to the average consumer. No longer did Mr. Coffee reign supreme over the kitchen counter, but he had not finally begun a revival of home coffee experimentation. Now, on this present day of June, you can find not only the different methods like (filter-based, immersion, etc.) but tons of different outlets in each, like the many different approaches to spill. But some people still like their old-school means of making coffee. The automated method made famous by giants like Bunn and Cuisinart still appeals to a large population that wants to fill their coffee water reservoir, add the grinds and press a button. For this market, there are the usual suspects, new players (such as Bonavita) and some entities back from the grave, such as the once common name of Brim. Renewed after a few years off the grid, Brim has now returned touting a low-cost coffee maker with some added advanced forwards for added convenience. Curious of this coffee maker, I took advantage of the recent opportunity of the brim staff to try it in my house. My first impression was that this coffee machine looked a lot like most of its brothers. It has the basic plastic construction of questionable degree (theme leeches to avoid plastic when I can), a shower head nozzle (a feature that becomes more common, thank God), a filter basket with a reusable mesh filter included, and a basic water reservoir. Some of the bonus features are as follows: Two separate buttons for a coffee pot (activates the hot plate) or a cup of coffee (keeps the plate warm outside) A retractable position for the said coffee cup option coming out of the rear sand of the coffee maker A bold fit that allows the water to get steeper in the basket before draining Taking it for a spin , I made coffee both in the coffee maker through the coffee maker button, and in a coffee mug through the coffee mug button. In addition, I used the mesh filter as well as just a paper filter. As for the finer parameters, I really couldn't identify the water temperature at the point of manufacture (and I didn't want to risk injuries in interrupting the beer process to find out) and my grinding size was about an average grind. The infusions, in short, came out tasting quite tasty, without real flavor or defect (although, like all similar plastic coffee makers, the real test would be in the coming months after regular use). The configuration of the cup seemed to take a little longer than setting the pan to drain the coffee, which scared me to use the bold fit (besides, I try not to use things that will make my coffee adventurous). In conclusion, while the Brim Coffee Maker performed slightly better than her department store colleagues, she didn't really light anything on fire in me (figuratively, of course). The things I really don't like about the average coffee maker (the hot plate, the low-grade plastic, the hard-to-clean heating element, etc.) were still present in Brim. Also, the bonus features were not features that greatly improved the experience (i.e. making direct on my glass is no big deal). On the other hand, it should be noted that I am a person who will spend the extra minutes preparing my coffee if it means a better cup, so if you are a person looking for a basic coffee maker with a hot dish that you can get around, or a button that will allow you the option to steep your coffee for longer, this may be the option for you. Note: The coffee station was provided free of charge and the above review is the objective feedback. Feedback.
