Wing luke museum shop

Our market supports more than 100 small businesses as part of our commitment to becoming a community-based organization. Dive deeper into the story within our walls with a selection of books curated by and about the Asia Pacific Americas. Watch for more updates as we add more stuff! We have created several gift sets that you can order yourself or send to someone you like to show you care, just specify their shipping address when you check out. We recommend booking ASAP or on December 15 for timely delivery for Christmas. Results from our market support our exhibitions and youth programs. Please see the gift set below that has been packaged for your convenience. The full store inventory can be searched live during our business hours, Friday-Sunday from 10am to 5pm, or ordered by phone at (206) 623-5124 x203 Wednesday-Sunday 10am-5pm. Questions? Call marketplace@wingluke.org. By Jenna Scatena Contributing Writer Set we have an overview of the space. The 60,000-square-foot facility focuses on meeting The History of Asia and the American Pacific. Set in an industrial-chic brick building, the three-story contemporary gallery houses a temporary and permanent exhibition, next to a historic space accessible via guided tours. What will we find in the permanent collection? The permanent collection includes homages to the museum's name, Councilman Wing Luke (the first Asian American elected to public office in the Pacific Northwest), and other exhibitions exploring the cultural heritage of Pan-Asia Pacific American immigrants, addressing topics such as local history, working conditions, social justice, and community. What about special exhibitions? The temporary exhibition is a huge raffle here, including A Dragon Lives Here, a four-part exhibition on Bruce Lee's Seattle roots. Also spinning through are exploratory pieces on connections to community and tea, and the works of other artists of Pacific heritage. What do you make of the crowd? This museum is a favorite of local people, also the center of public attention. But many travelers also visit, especially those interested in learning about the stories of Seattle's underrepresented community. On a practical tip, are we going to need to take some rest? The museum is small enough that it is easy to get around without the need for too much rest — which is a good thing, since the amount of sitting space is quite small. Have a guided tour worth a try? Tours, such as the Touch of Chinatown stretch outside the building to the Chinatown-International District where it is based. The seasonal Rice Stuff tour is a great one that goes to some historic culinary places. What will we find in the gift shop? Museum Market Bruce Lee paraphernalia, hard-to-find books, and some locally made jewelry. Is the café worth stopping, or should we plan to go somewhere else? The best way experiencing the culinary side of things here is following one of the food-focused tours through the surrounding environment. They occur irregularly, so be sure to check the calendar on the museum's website. Otherwise, the staff has many recommendations for local restaurants. Any suggestions for time or attention challenges? This is an easy place to get into your schedule, even if it feels a bit tight. It is certainly worth breezing through, at least. That's what Wing Luke Museum does. I visited last summer with my college-aged daughter and we still talk about how much we love it. It's not the best museum for younger kids (a lot of reading and talking that would be boring), but it's very appealing to teenagers and older adults. We loved the tour of the various waves of Asian immigrant apartments and general stores. It's not every day you get to learn about cool things like Bruce Lee and things that aren't as cool as red lines all in one afternoon. I think Wing Luke is a perfect example of what museums can and should be: interesting, educational, approachable, and beautiful and a place that inspires you to be a better human being. (It also has a nice gift shop!) ... Experience date: October 2019 Sunny and Buster wrote a review Feb 2020 Seattle, Washington 726 contributed 141 helpful votes We haven't been to Wing Luke in his new location and wow if it's great. Normally I skip formal tours but I highly recommend you take the tour (included in the admission price) as it takes you through an old part of the hotel that you can't see for yourself and gives you an insight into the local community at the time to this day. They have also preserved a general store with all the contents so it feels like a window into that world. Temporary exhibitions are not great well presented and well presented. Very nice museum. ... The hotel tour (included in the admission price) was very informative and historical. It's not for young people. The tour lasts about an hour. I learned about the name of the museum and then explored the replicated Chinese grocery store and adjacent SRO hotel for newly arrived Asian immigrants. I love this exhibition because they're not tarted up like some Disney look, but rather they're pretty much saved like them, accentuating the minimalist conditions/run downs of those who live here. (So is the NYC tenement museum). My only complaint is that I would love more time to explore these areas. The main part of the museum houses exhibits on all the Asian groups that have made Seattle home over the years – what brought them here, the challenges they faced on arrival, cultural differences, etc. There are some interesting art/photo exhibitions and Bruce Lee exhibitions are done very well. Back in early 2018 I was fortunate to have visited the Hong Kong Heritage Museum for a massive Bruce Lee exhibition (run by his foundation) and I must say, while memorabilia is here on a much smaller scale, the content and quality are excellent. The young women working at the front desk were very friendly and recommended some places in the neighborhood for lunch/dinner. Allow 2.5-3 hours and do one of the docent led tours (including with admission prices). ...
