In a good way? Read on... Trondheim turned into a winter wonderland this weekend with a fresh coat of sparkly snow (have you seen my Instagram?), but there's something else going on here: it's dark. It's not even December, but the days are already so short – the sun went down at 3pm yesterday – so it kind of explodes the thought that we are technically still in the south of Norway. But what can we do on these long winter nights? Of course watch tv shows! Fortunately, Norway has a great offer in this department. Cue eye rolls from anyone who's ever turned on a television in Norway.What's the best way to describe a Norwegian television series... Topa? Interesting? Wait, SWAT. Yes, Norwegian tv shows are certainly special. So special, in fact, that watching TV in Norway was probably the best way for Dan and me to learn more about Norwegian culture. Five Norwegian television series taught me so much about the (often crazy naacolo) Norwegian way of life. Summer boatsourceWhat we first came to Trondheim everything NRK had ever seen was a snapshot of the boat. There used to be shots from a boat, sometimes a boat, people waving at the boat from the mainland, and every one of them and there, the boat would stop somewhere and people would throw a party for it. It was a summer ship we were watching, a small taste of Norwegian slow television. It all started in 2009 with a 7-hour train transfer from Bergen to Oslo. Since then, they have shown 18 hours of minute-per-minute salmon fishing, 13 hours of live knitting, and all 899 hymns in hymns that they sing live for more than 60 hours. And then there was my favorite, a 12-hour show of logs that were burning in a fire, Even the New York Times was waking up to Norwegian reactions like that I couldn't sleep because I was so excited... When will they add new logs? Shortly before I was able to break off, they probably opened the chimney a little bit, because that's when the flames were shooting a little higher. In the world of smartphones, 4G and endless multitasking, it's hard to imagine people finding real excitement for something so, well, slow. Is it all the time norwegians spend in nature, which makes them more appreciated by the simpler things in life, or does the frozen landscape just mean that everything, including fun, moves slower here? I'm not sure, but I feel like getting excited about watching someone put the playsms on fire is probably a really good thing, and I hope that after more time in Norway it happens to me too. LilyhammerLilyhammer is probably norway's most famous drama series at the moment, isn't it? I mean, Norwegian TV series are greatly known for getting started, but a lot of my friends abroad have heard of this Norwegian TV show. If you don't know this, it's a show about New York gangster Frank Tagliano (played by Sopranos star Steven Van Zandt), who hides in Lillehammer, where he hides in all sorts of fun fun. I showed Lilyhammer to Dan when we first started talking about moving to Norway and I expected him to be excluded from the idea of living in Norway, but it did the opposite. Yes, the show points to many ways in which Norway is old-fashioned, lacks diversity and is not the easiest place to get things done, but it also just makes the country look so damn weird. Like when Tagliano goes to jail and looks super comfortable and he spends all his time working fun crafts and group therapy. Dan said he would be happy to move to Norway because in the worst case scenario he could hang out in prison! Of course, he was joking, although if he wasn't, it would still be hard for him to get in - in four months of life in Norway's third largest city, I saw a policeman exactly zero times. In the summer, everyone was drinking in the park, which is technically illegal here. Our friends told us that they gently reminded us that they were here and... You're not going to do anything? Alt For NorgeAlt For Norge brings for the first time to Norway a group of Americans with Norwegian heritage, where they compete in various Norwegian games to get a big prize for meeting norwegian relatives. Dan and I are addicted, mainly because watching Americans struggling to learn Norwegian history, culture and language is a nice weekly confidence boost. Alt For Norge also taught me two important things. Norwegian culture. First, Norwegians like to talk about how special Norway is. Because American pop culture has such a large presence in Norway, I think people here enjoy it when Americans try to learn more about their little country. The show takes contestants through the most beautiful and culturally important areas of Norway, and I have the feeling that I am not the only person watching with a sense of pride over how lovely Norway is. This is perhaps why this article is one of my most popular blog posts. And second, the Norwegians hate confrontation. Every week, a contestant who showed the best team spirit gets the Spirit Award, which means they're safe from elimination next week. It also means that everyone is always super friendly to each other in the hope of receiving a reward. Like, what? I thought it was the job of television producers to amplify the drama and not eliminate the possibility that conflicts would ever get away with it. Apparently not in Norwegian tv shows. Adam's looking for Eval, I admit I was surprised when I flew through the canals and ran into nudity. Did Dan order the cable and forgot to tell me? No, it's just Europe. Swearing here is absolutely cool too – even on NRK I've heard people say c, a word that is considered so bad in America that I dare just write one of the letters down. Adam Looking for Eva is a dating show where two people meet on a deserted island with no clothes on. Originally it was a Dutch show, but now many European countries have made their own versions – including Norway! It's not the best show, but I like that people have perfectly normal bodies on this. Can you imagine what the American version of this would look like? I'm sure it wouldn't be good for my image. News and national news that rarely makes me feel warm and comfortable. Especially now that so much news around the world seems to successfully fill people with terror (um, speaking of which, has the US State Department now put out a warning for travel for the whole world? By the end of February?), I'm very happy to be in Norway, where a few days ago a good five-minute evening news was devoted to footage of a woman feeding a squirrel. Truly. Do you have any other bizarre Norwegian TV series you'd like to add? Pin him up! This!
