I bet on losing dogs

My baby, my baby You are my baby, say it to me Baby, my baby Tell your baby that I am your baby I bet on losing dogs I know they lose and I pay for my place Of the ring Where I will look in their eyes when they are down I'll be there on their side I lose by their side Will you let me, baby Lose on losing dogs I know they lose and I pay for my place through the ring where I will look in their eyes when they are down I want to feel it I bet on losing dogs I always want you when I finally fine how you would be over me looking in my eyes when I cum someone to see me die Someone to see me die I bet on losing dogs my baby, my baby You're my baby, tell me Baby, my baby Tell your baby that I'm your baby I bet on losing dogs I know they lose and I pay for my place Of the ring Where I will look in their eyes when they are down I'll be there on their side I lose by their side Will you let me, baby Lose on losing dogs I know that they are losing and I pay for my seat Of the ring Where I will look in their eyes when they are down I want to feel it I bet on losing dogs I always want you when I finally fine How you would be over me looking in my eyes when I cum Someone to see me die Someone to see me die I bet on losing dogs So from what I discussed with humans, everyone just generally thinks the metaphor for the losing dogs is Mitski is in failing/toxic relationships even though she knows they are fail/toxic. But I listened to the song again and I think the last-ish line how you would be me looking in my eyes when I cum is important, especially in relation to where I will look in their eyes when they are down. I think Mitski actually changes the point of view in his song. The first stanzas and the choir are actually Mitski lovers and Mitski is the losing dog. Why her lover seems to be obsessed with her suffering, I'm not sure. But hey, that's my interpretation.
