In terms of head-to-head at Wimbledon, Nadal and Federer have faced each other three times, with Federer holding a 2-1 advantage. It's a long wait, but the most enthralling modern rivalry in men's tennis returns to the scene of the most dramatic episode on Friday, when Roger Federer and Rafael Nadal meet for a place in the Wimbledon final. Much has changed since that epic Sunday night in 2008, when, as the last strands of daylight ebbed away, Nadal dethroned the king of Centre Court in a rain-hit final that will forever be part of Wimbledon folklore. Centre Court now has a retractable roof just like Court One, for starters, and Federer has two sets of twins. Nadal's knees are creakier, his hair thinner and the sleeveless tops and pirate pants he wore as a 22-year-old tyro have been replaced by regular tennis attire. They've both had dips and comebacks and both have been written off from time to time. But form is temporary. Class holds. Federer is approaching his 38th birthday and Nadal is 33, but they remain the two central pillars of men's tennis with 20 and 18 grand slam titles respectively. They have met 22 times since that epic five-setter when Nadal became the first Spaniard since Manolo Santana in 1966 to win the men's title, proving that he was not only a claycourt bully, but had developed his topspin match after losing consecutive Wimbledon finals against Federer in 2006 and 2007.What TV channel is the men's Wimbledon semi-final between Rafael Nadal and Roger Federer?
