They are now too old to be scared of the house, but Scout still wisely wants to see Boo Radley only once. Meanwhile, the shadow of the court is still hanging over her. One day at school, miss Gates, a third-grade teacher, lectured a class about the iniquity of Hitler's persecution of Jews and the virtues of equality and democracy. The scout listens and later asks Jem how Ms. Gates could preach about equality when she walked out of the courthouse after the trial and told Ms. Stephanie Crawford that it was a lesson about the time that someone taught blacks in the city. Jem becomes furious and says Scout will never mention the trial to him again. Scout, upset, goes to atticus comfort. Summary: Chapter 27 Until mid-October, Bob Ewell gets a job with WPA, one of the depressive work programs, and loses it after a few days. He accuses Atticus of getting his job done. Also in mid-October, Judge Taylor is home alone and hears someone prowling around; When he goes to the inquiry, he finds his screen door open and sees the shadow creeping away. Bob Ewell then starts tracking Helen Robinson to work, keeping her distance, but whispers profanity at her. Deas sees Ewell and threatens to have him arrested if he does not leave Helen alone; it does not give it any additional problems. However, these events worry Aunt Alexandra, who points out that Ewell seems to be a grudge against anyone involved in the case. To make Halloween, the city supports party and play school. This plan is an attempt to avoid an unsupervised previous Halloween prank when someone purchased into the home of two elderly sisters and hid all their furniture in their basement. The play is an agricultural pageant in which every child depicts food: a scout wearing a wire grid that looks like ham. Both Atticus and Aunt Alexandra are too tired to attend the celebrations, so Jem takes scout to school. Analysis: Chapters 26–27 These short sections are characterized by a stinging mounting mood, laced with a growing sense of real danger. They begin with a reference to Radley Place, a source of childhood terror that no longer frightens Jem and Scout Boo Radley was at least our fear, Scout comments. Jem and Scout's youthful fear of boo dissipation reflects how the trial hardened them and how, after the trial of injustice and Bob Ewell's threats, the children became the more serious concerns of the adult world. Radley Place is part of the past now. The aura of scar attached to the name Boo dissolved into curiosity, perhaps even in love. As Jem and Scout gain a better understanding of Boo, it looks less like an urban freak for them and more, strangely, like pet or plaything. Scout still expresses a desire to see Boo someday, and she remembers fondly almost facing boo during the summers of the past. These memories recreate Boo Radley in the reader's consciousness, which was occupied with most part ii of the trial, following the appearance of foreshadowing boo a few chapters later. Meanwhile, the court's effects continue to be terrific, and Jem and Scout's fading fear of boo highlights the real danger to Bob Ewell during various attempts at revenge. Bob Ewell shows himself to be sinister, and the fact that he hasn't tried anything against Finches only increases the sense of empathy. Atticus remains convinced of its safety, but this confidence is beginning to look like a desire to think. In fact, rather than offering more thematic comments, Lee devotes a large part of these sections to building tension and suspense, focusing on the unpredictable threat that Bob Ewell poses. The previous Halloween misconduct, which led to the idea of Halloween's play this year, again alludes to the damage done by those who act without remorse. Meanwhile, an incident involving Ms. Gates reveals how much Jem remains affected by the trial. Despite the grim experience of the court, Scout maintains his faith in the fundamental goodness of others, so her teacher's apparent hypocrisy confuses her. Meanwhile, Jam became frustrated, and when Scout tries to talk to him about Miss Gates, he switches off from the painful memory of the court. Bob Ewell's threats are not just a dark cloud hanging over Finch's home in this section: the injustice of the trial has changed Jem irrevocably. Irrevocably.
