Varius guide jacke

Marcus Kerner1 +4 February 8, 2010 | Update June 9, 2011 Good around the mountain crust for winter and severe weather. Easy to zip in TNF Denali Polartec Liner or Nuptse Down Liner. I have all three pieces for different conditions. The only minor, very minor drawback is the zipper. It gets stuck at the bottom. If it ever gets to the point that it won't work, the jacket has a lifetime warranty from TNF. It keeps me dry, used at 60 knots gale and remained completely wind and water protected, skiing excellent, backpacking excellent, with the addition of down liner in below zero weather, excellent. This is a good measure of the road when it comes to price. You have to spend about $200 to $300 more to get to high-end Goretex Shells, even for sale. If you are looking to get the best bang for your buck, this is a good investment and will last for years. Hyvent, a waterproof breathable fabric used in this shell, works, breathes, keeps dry, and strong unpleasant wind is never a problem. The hood is adjustable at the back to fit comfortable when you're not wearing a climbing or ski helmet. Update: June 9, 2011 This is an updated review of my posting on the North Face Varius Guide Jacket. In 2010, I posted a rating on this jacket as 4.5. I noticed in my post a slight problem with the main zipper. Well in 2011 the zipper finally died (zippers wear some after more than a thousand days of use) and I sent the jacket to the North Face Warranty Department in San Leandro, CA. I got an upcoming Sierra trip and told them I needed to get it back right away. I hereby officially upgrade my rating to a solid 5. Why? Since North Face not only repaired my jacket, but improved the zipper with a very good quality replacement for the main zipper in the complementary color of the jacket, but here's the best part, on warranty at no charge for me, free return shipping and did it all in one week!!! Now it's a product and a company worth relying on, they said GUARANTEED FOR LIFE and they mean it. Thank you, North Face, great jacket, great warranty service.
