You can also return to the full list of adjectives that begin with x. Ask someone to name a word that starts with x, and you'll probably get xylophone or X-rays. It's not very inspiring, is it? What if you asked someone to name an adjective that starts with x? Several blank looks await you. Adjectives beginning with x exist, though. For the most part, they fall into one of four categories (xanth, xen, xer or xyl) based on their Greek roots, letter x of the alphabet The Greek root xanth means yellow, so every time you see it in a word, it probably has something to do with the color.xanthic - yellow or yellowish; of or have to do with the compound xantinaexanthous - yellow in color; for people with yellowish, burning or light brown hair Xen means foreign, so the following adjectives all have to do with strange, foreign, unnatural or non-native.xenogenic things - coming from outside the organism or from a foreign substance introduced into theXenolithic organism - or related to a fragment rock foreign to the igneous rock in which it is is - unjustifiably frightened by foreigners or foreigners - replicating or reproducing only in cells other than those of the host speciesWhat would be the English language without a couple of oddities? In the following examples, both words begin with xen, but actually mean the opposite of foreign.xenial - a friendly relationship between guest and guestxenodochial - friendly with strangers Xer means dry. Xer root-based adjectives refer in some way to dryness. Although dryness is not necessarily what you think about when you make copies on an Xerox machine, the origin of the word is the same. In the 1930s, a New York patent attorney wanted to find a way to make copies that did not involve chemicals (as was required for photography at the time). Eventually, photocopy (or xerography) became an electrical process, not a chemical one. Then, xerography results in dry writing, making photocopying a dry process. Pretty cool, right? xeric - adapted to a dryxerographic environment - relating to xerophilic xerophile xerophile xerophile - capable of thriving in a warm environment, dry climate, as some plants and animals - related to the abnormal dryness of the eyeball characterized by conjunctivitis, a lack of tear xerophytics - related to a plant adapted for growth in dry hydrothermal conditions - related to a warm and dry climatic period, such as one of the postglacialixerotic - dry periods; affection or characterized by xerosi Xyl means wood, so all the following adjectives have something to do with wood. That's where everyone's favorite X-word (noun), xylophone, comes into play. Xylophones today can be made of metal or fiberglass, as well as wood, but the word itself comes from the fact that xylophones were originally made of wooden bars of various lengths. Take a look at these adjectives xyl: xylographic - related to the art of engraving on xyloid - of wood or the like; xylophagus - eat, bore or destroy woodysophonic - related to the sound produced by a xylophoneosillotome - able to cut or bore in wood While most adjectives begin with xanth, xen, xer or xyl, there are some that do not. x-acto - cutting tool while most adjectives start with xanth, xen, xer or xyl, there are some that do not. x-acto - too sharp cutting tool (knife) with a replaceable blade; used for scrapbooking and other types of craft projectsxiphophyllous - botanical term for a plant with sword-shaped leaves Knowing that these adjectives exist is beneficial, but it can still be difficult to find ideas on how to work them in your writing or spoken communication. Review some phrases of can be a great source of inspiration. Be careful not to order xeric indoor plants as cacti. Having a xenial nature is essential to a successful career as a hotel concierge. My dog has such a xenophobic nature that I'm afraid he might wander with a stranger from the dog park. When I worked on my newspaper, we used an x-acto knife to cut typographic copy strips into columns for placement in the layout. It wouldn't be wise to hire someone with xenophobic tendencies to work in human resources for a global company. Strawberry blonde hair is redr than blonde, but with an xanthous tone. Be sure to mention your xerographic skills when applying to work for a printer. Termites are xylotomomi insects that can quickly destroy wooden structures.
