Bedford school district pa

Photo: shutterstock.comYou doesn't need kids to understand that good public schools support the value of homes in their district. And while higher-quality schools are usually accompanied by higher property taxes, homeowners in such districts are eventually repaid by a higher home selling price. Being repaid sounds great, but how much are we talking about? New research from Realtor.com shows that for access to a desirable school district, 9% of buyers say they will pay 11% to 20% above budget. Separately, 17% report they will pay extra to be close enough that their children could walk to and from school. Related: 7 Renovation Tips to Increase Resale ValueIn the showdown between amenities for adults and education for kids, you guessed it: the kids win. Realtor.com found that 62% of buyers will pass a home pass if it means getting into the right school district. 50% would give easy access to shopping, while 44% would give up space in the form of a bonus room. If the home you plan to sell is located in a highly sought-after school district, do everything in your power to highlight that fact in all your real estate marketing materials. Many potential buyers are the parents of children currently in the school system, so make sure you make up the word among neighbors and local friends. If you're buying a home, use a search tool that enables you to filter through school district, since district boundaries don't always align with town, town and city lines. After all, you can't assume your kids will be assigned to attend the same school as the kids in the block or even next door. Did a school in a Philadelphia suburb covered on students in their homes spy, via their webcams? In the case of Blake J Robbins v Lower Merion School District (PA) et al, it is alleged that the district is in a whole heap of trouble: up to and including child pornography. In IT Blogwatch, horrified bloggers pick up their pitch forks, light their flaming torches and march over to Harrilton High School. By Rich Jennings. February 19, 2010.Your humble blogwatcher chose these bloggy morsels for your enjoyment. Not to mention Apple's reflection-distortion field... Cory Doctorow blogs disturbing allegations from the city of brotherly love: Laptops issued to high school students in the well-heeled Philly suburb [of Lower Merion] have webcams that [allegedly] can be covered up by the schools' administrators. ... The issue came to light when [a] child was disciplined for improper conduct in his home and the vice-principal used a photo taken by the webcam as evidence. ... If true, these allegations are about as creepy as they come. ... The idea that a school district would... use these machines if AV faults are purely horrendous. The school district Dr. Christopher McGinley retorts: The laptops contain a security feature intended to be lost, stolen and missing laptops... [which] is a regular target for theft. ... The tracking-security feature is limited to taking a still image from the operator and the operator's screen. This feature was only used for the limited purpose of tracking down a lost, stolen, or missing laptop. The district did not use the detection function or web cam whatsoever for any other purpose or any other means. ... This feature is effectively disabled today. ... [We] do [not] ... expect reactivation [it] ... without express written notice to all students and families. Jesus Diaz reports claims that this was not an isolated incident: [We were contacted by students] with details about what happened. Often, the green lights next to us... webcams will turn on. The school district claims to be just a glitch. We all doubt this now.... I questioned the IT guy about why it happened he said that it was because people signed up when an application using the camera was up, he also said that they could in fact go and look through your webcam it would only violate the fifth encouragement and that's why they weren't. Today, their principal went out loud and said that all of this wasn't true. Alex Pasternack has a sense of déjà vu: [It's] rare news. Schools have been doing this for years. In... Frontline's recent documentary Digital Nation, a principal at a school in New York City... use pre-installed spy software to watch its students check their hair and Facebook. ... That technology has already killed their privacy may not be news to many children. ... Perhaps, somehow, principals are using their network of spy webcams to learn a little object lesson, albeit a depressing and unhelpful one: you can be watched. But Mistlefoot is concerned about child pornography: If even a single 14 years naked in the privacy of their own home were viewed by a covert camera laws will have been broken. A life sentence is what this man faced... Jud Pratt agrees: The individuals involved in this policy should be charged with attempting to obtain child pornography. ... The laptops ... could easily have been in the child's room where they would absolutely have a reasonable expectation of privacy. This is no different than if the teacher/administrator drilled a peephole in that child's room. ... Also, if I were a parent, I'd be incredibly angry if school faculty only has the right to deal with a student's behaviour when they are on school grounds or attend school functions. And shogarth highlights the difference between criminal and civil: If it was my daughter's computer, I wouldn't talk about a class-action suit with a attorney. I would sit down at the police HQ and the district attorney's office. ... They will use the charges that their behavior warranted. Once it rolled, I'd go after the individuals (not the district) for civil damages. ... I don't want to look my neighbors in the face when a fractional point increase in their property taxes is needed to pay a civil settlement that made me wealthy. I have no problems with bankrupting the people who authorized and deployed the technology. Meanwhile, McGrew is studying the law of the jungle: If any of the parents are like some people I know, those administrators should fear for their personal safety. So what's your take? Get involved: leave a comment. ... And finally... Apple. Can we blame it on Adobe? Rich Jennings is an independent analyst/consultant, specializing in blogging, email and security. Don't miss IT Blogwatch: Copyright © 2010 IDG Communications, Inc. Jonathan Kim/Stone/Getty Images The best way to find out one's school district is to consult an online search engine that uses geographic identifiers to determine the school district. The U.S. Department of Education's National Center for Educational Statistics provides one such tool, and Great Schools offers a similar one. Once one has determined the correct school district, it is sometimes still necessary to find out which school one is allocated. This can be done by linking the local school district. Many larger school districts, including the Los Angeles and New York counties, offer online search tools that use the requester's home address to determine the assigned school. School.
