BJCC Concert Hall seat numbers – Loge, Orchestra, Mezzanine and Balcony seats Areater seats are usually arranged so that the lower seat numbers are located near the center of the stage, while the higher seat numbers are far from the center of the stage. Rows are usually organized alphabetically. The BJC Concert Hall may be arranged in a similar way, loge seats, sometimes called Box Seating, have small and fragmented seating areas, large enough to fit a limited number of people for a more personal viewing experience. Loge seats are usually located at the front, side and immediately above the stage level. The orchestra usually holds the seats that need it most, keeping the audience at the same level as the stage. Center Orchestra seats are often the most popular seats in the House. When looking at the orchestra section beside the lower seat number indicates its proximity to the orchestra center, and the center of the stage. Seats near the aisle often give you more legroom. The mezzanine is usually located above the center of the orchestra. The seats in the center of the city are also highly desirable, especially within the first few rows. Balconies often hold the cheapest seats in the theater. Often, the balcony seats are positioned more closely together, providing less legroom compared to other parts. This section is generally on a steep slope, which means that the difference of visibility between low and high rows can be significant.
