If you're switching jobs: Job replacements shouldn't be an excuse to label the workplace you've worked in is bad. You should tell your boss why you left the company and you should point out the things that bother you, do it politely and professionally however. Keeping a measure of professionalism has led to this one aspect of your career. This one helps to make solid references later. In conversations with potential new employers, it is important to be professional. You should also tell your first class, you are grateful for the opportunity you had in working for his company or even hers. You never know whenever your current boss will prove to be a great reference. Be aware that no one likes to end up being criticized. Not even from subordinates or colleagues. Although they deserve it. Someone you've worked with can be a potentially positive reference. Do not destroy the bridges behind you. Keep genuine contacts. A California school district settled the claim Tuesday with the Department of The Civil Rights Office said officials allegedly discriminated against a transgender elementary school student. The Downey Unified School District agreed, among other things, to give students access to facilities specific to women, to ensure that students are not disciplined for being transgender and to provide students with age-appropriate information about gender identity, according to a press release from the U.S. Department of Education.The school district signed an agreement without acknowledging it violated federal law and before an investigation from the federal agency's Office of Civil Rights could be completed. Our federal civil rights law protects all students from discrimination and sexual harassment, said Catherine E. Lhamon, assistant secretary of citizenship. The complaint alleges that the school district did not adequately respond to the harassment faced by transgender students from her colleagues. It also said staff disciplined the elementary school student for her makeup, prevented her from talking about her gender identity with classmates and suggested she move to another school.
