Funny letter to bride from bridesmaid

I get it-- it's your birthday. You planned it, you paid for it, and almost everything should be to your liking - the operative word almost. One thing you might not have control over is what bridesmaids decide to do to their appearance before your wedding, would be getting a haircut. And a bride just found out the truth of the wedding the hard way. A future bridesmaid asked the reddit thread I got the son of a bitch's ass wrong because he cut his long hair before his sister-in-law's wedding. I've been growing my hair for years and I'm sick of it. Yesterday, I went from hair down past my ass and had it cut into a short cut, like a pixie, wrote the original poster. She even continued to share the sweet reason why she decided to cut everything: I cut so much out of it because I donated to an organization called Children's Wigs; i do free wigs for children with cancer and alopecia, she explained. In total, I donated 48 centimeters of hair. I really like it, the hair stylist said it was perfect for the shape of my face, my fiance loves it, it was such a reliable booster. Earlier, the bridesmaid explained that her sister-in-law is getting married in June and that she is planning a big wedding. She admitted that the bride was very kind, but rightly pretentious - up to this point. I posted a photo on Instagram today of a picture of the bundles of hair I sent to donate, she wrote. I later get a text from her saying I should have asked before I cut all that hair off as she doesn't think it will fit her extremely feminine designs/decorations, I'm in her wedding party and now she'll stand out from her and the other girls (all have long hair too), and wishes I just waited a month to cut it. The bridesmaid, who had the right to cut her own hair, was really stuck in terms of how to respond. She explained in her viral post that it was the first wedding she would be at and didn't know if such things were normal. Should I have asked her before making such a dramatic change in physical appearance?, she posed for the group. Figuring out how many bridesmaids to choose (not to mention who to choose) can be... Well, complicated. Sometimes the choice of bridesmaids can feel like you're captain of the kickball team, trying to decide on the top five or 10 of the most eligible players for your team. But just because you have a lot of close friends or family members doesn't mean you all have to stand by your side on your wedding day. There are a lot of ways in which they may be there for you that do not require a hand-chosen chiffon dress or a repeated walk down the aisle. If you find yourself breaking into a Stress over how many bridesmaids to have in the bridal party, remember these four simple rules. Jessica Olah/Brides bottom line: You don't need a certain number of You don't have to choose an odd number or an even number or a certain number, it would be five, because you've been to (or been part of) other weddings where it happened. It's not a numbers game and there's certainly no hard and fast rule you should abide by when it comes to how many ladies (or gentlemen) you want to lead the way for yourself down the aisle. Also, you don't need to have a matching number of bridesmaids for grooms. The only time anyone might notice that one side has less than the other is when it's time for them to walk down the aisle, which, by the way, your guests aren't really paying so much attention to anyway, because they're sitting there fdgeting in anticipation, waiting for you to walk down the aisle. If you are nervous about how the group photos will look with an uneven wedding party, ask the photographer to stage different configurations and poses, so it is not just a straight line of people standing next to each other. There is no rule that says you have to select bridesmaids on the basis that asked you to be a part of their wedding party in the past and certainly you don't have to extend invite to someone just because you stood by their side a few years ago. If you're still close to her, go for it! But if you haven't spoken in a few years (or more) it'll be a little weird rekinding your friendship while you're also in the middle of planning the wedding. You don't have to have bridesmaids at all. Even without an official bride tribe you can still have a booming bachelorette party and invite all your besties-who may be even happier in the long run, seeing you've saved you from having to spend money on a bridesmaid dress you might not wear again. On the other hand, do you have a guy in your life that you can't imagine leaving out? By all means, ask him to join your wedding party along with the rest of the maid! The number of girls (and boys) that you choose to include in the wedding party can reveal a lot about you as a person, as well as you like and hobbies. Whether you're going big or keeping it super small, find out what number of bridesmaids say about you. Lauren Methia Photography You're a social butterfly and always love to have a gaggle of friends around you. Your motto in life is to work hard, to play hard -- and that's what you do! Even after a long day at work, you can still often be found taking part in happy hour, meeting with one of many social groups or inviting friends over for an improv party. You're charming and absolutely irresistible, so it's no wonder that people are naturally by your frothy energy. Photo of Ashley Caroline You're a modern day nomad with besties scattered across the country, maybe even around the world. Some may say you're undecided, but your friends mean everything to you, and you don't have to imagine saying yes without. Without. Maids all standing by your side. Jump to the chance to organize a vacay friends and can talk for hours with them about everything from the latest celeb gossip and binge-worthy shows to the current state of their love life. Others would definitely describe it as the outgoing, fun of being around and even party life from time to time. Piper Rastello Photography While you like socializing and hanging out with your friends, you also like time alone and can get overwhelmed when there are too many people around at once. Your most likely bridal party consists of your sister(s) or sister-in-law, your childhood BFF and a few other super close friends that you've known and loved for years. You may have been a dancing machine in your day alone, but now you enjoy drinks and dinner (and brunch, of course) with a tighter circle of friends and their significant others at weekends. Nathan Smith couldn't decide who to choose from your closest friends, so you simply opted to ask only your beast and/or sister(s) instead. That doesn't mean you won't have some of the rest of your team stop by for a quick champagne toast before the ceremony or all hit the dance floor together at the reception. You're extremely loyal, all about family and you'd do anything for the people you love in your life. In your spare time, you don't like anything more than hitting an art show or even checking out your favorite up-and-coming band at a diving bar. On the other hand, you're also completely happy having a movie night in with your other significant-soon-to-be-husband! Melina Wallisch Photography March to the rhythm of your drum, and as far as tradition is concerned, you're certainly not afraid to break up with it. Of course, you have several close friends you could ask for, but your wedding is already on the smaller side and you really want to focus on the two of you. That doesn't mean you like to be in the spotlight, though; In fact, there's a chance it's the exact opposite. Small words are none of your business; you prefer deeper conversations to mindless talk. Photo of Alexandra Roberts It turns out, being a good bridesmaid is more than showing up to a shower or two and looking pretty up next to the bride when she tells her I dos. It's about getting together with the rest of the group and keeping the bride as stress-free and as happy as possible, all while maintaining your own common sense and serenity in the process. If it sounds a lot to handle, and it may be, but you got this, girl! With a little planning and preparation and sound tips from some seasoned vets, you'll be the bridesmaid-ing as it's your job because, well, it is! If concerns about giving things like dress, airfare, etc., let the bride know immediately. Have a frank discussion before committing to be in the wedding in order to avoid any on both ends later. - Kathleen might not seem like a big deal to you, but waiting until the last minute to order the bridesmaid's dress gives the bride just one more thing to stress about, and in my experience, she already has enough of that! So make her life a little easier and don't be that bridesmaid that she has to email five different times to check into the condition of ordering the dress. Just do it the first time she asks and sends her updates! - Layla Even on a low-budget wedding with a bachelorette party that's in town, it's easy to drop upwards of $1,000 being a bridesmaid. My advice to other girls would be to always put aside a few hundred dollars more than you think you'll need. Better to be safe than sorry! - Unlike guests, you'll be standing and on your feet most of the day, starting long before the ceremony starts, so I'd recommend getting comfortable shoes with a small heel. Oh, and if they're new, definitely break them first! - Amanda There's always that bridesmaid who makes everything so much harder than it needs to be. She hates the dress, complains about the destination of the bachelorette party, is never on time, etc. As maid of honor, it's your job to keep the peace, no matter how awful. Take control and do your best to resolve any situations that arise without the bride getting involved. If the bride needs to vent, listen and empathize, but be careful not to bash her boyfriend. - Melissa There will be times when you are exhausted and you really don't want to go help the bride choose her veil, for example, but if there is too much of an inconvenience, just do it. He'll appreciate it so much to have a second opinion. This advice goes for other things too, would be the dress of bridesmaid... suck it up and smile, even if it's not your style and you know you won't actually wear it again. - Sharon If the bride puts you in charge of planning her bachelorette party or hosting shower, not only assume everyone can contribute x amount. Ask for private budgets so as not to make anyone feel strange/uncomfortable. - Rebecca yes, you're a lady, but if the bride starts making crazy demands and treating you and other girls like, the sooner you talk up, with respect, of course, easier things will be in the long run. - Alyssa Alyssa
