Half of the 60 orange-and-white rooms have a balcony overlooking the river; the other 30 have large windows overlooking the mountains. Indigenous design elements return throughout the hotel: the Andean cross motif appears in bathrooms and on headpieces and ceilings; and Machu Picchu's architecture is reflected in the stacked block look of the floor tiles and square fittings and dishes. Energy saving is a priority: turning on lights requires an electronic key card and the hallway lighting is activated. Take part in a lost city tour arranged by the hotel on request, the daughter of the hotel porter, Lisette Aragon, has made an excellent guide. It's no secret that Machu Picchu is what travel bucket list dreams are made. The ancient ink is located in a tropical mountain forest. The apartments and temples, which are wrapped in mythical, are said to have been built in the middle of the 14th century and managed to escape the discovery by the Spanish conquistadors who invaded Peruvians. It wasn't until 1911, when Yale professor Hiram Bingham uncovered the ruins, that the outside world became aware of Machu Picchu and tourists from all over the world began to visit. These days, it's much easier to visit Machu Picchu than on Bingham Express. The trip is one of the most beautiful train journeys in the world and leads past the river Urubamba through lush valleys, fields and mountains in Peru's wild landscape. From the train's terminus, passengers can take the rest of the way by bus or enthusiastic adventurers can walk the Inca Way. For many of the millions of tourists who visit the holy site every year, it is a unique journey.
