Purdy, Founder Charles Flavelle, Former Owner Karen Flavelle, Employees Owner CEOSayy900 (2018) Websitewww.purdys.com Purdys Chocolates store Union Station (Toronto) Purdys Chocolatier is a Canadian chocolatier, confectionery manufacturer and retail operator. The company is based in Vancouver, British Columbia on the west coast of Canada. Purdys produces a variety of different chocolates and confectionery from its 57,000 square meter (5,295 m2) factory, distributed to all retail outlets. These products contain a variety of special chocolate; Truffles, nuts Hedgehogs, caramel, creams, molded filled chocolates, caramels and clusters included. Many individual outlets also prepare ice cream bars immersion and toppings covered in those that customers prefer in full view. Purdys opened its first outlets in Alberta in 1970 and began expanding outside British Columbia. Purdys then began expanding into Ontario in 2004. There are currently a total of over 70 stores in British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario. The History Company was founded in 1907 by Richard C. Purdy, who opened the first store in the history of Robson Street in Vancouver. According to the 1901 census, Purdy's profession was listed as a barber. After his wife's death, Purdy moved from London, Ontario, to British Columbia to start a new life in Vancouver. Purdy began experimenting with creating chocolate recipes in his home kitchen in Vancouver and then trying them out by selling them on the streets. In this way, he developed a small but enthusiastic [resource must be specified] customer base. In 1907, Purdy founded his first chocolate shop on Robson Street. In the 1920s, Purdy faced financial difficulty and was forced into receivership. A few of Purdy's big creditors sent their top accountant, Hugh Forrester, who didn't want the company to close, to save the company. A few years later, Forrester was able to reunite the company, and repay all the company's debts. The creditors, who had no interest in running the company and were so impressed with its performance, decided to sell the company to Forrester for $1. Richard Purdy continued to make chocolate after his business was sold and sold his products from a street car in Vancouver. Later Burnaby went to open a new chocolate shop, called The Window Made Candy in British Columbia. He retired a few years later and died in February 1941. In the 1940s, Frank Forrester joined his father Hugh in the family company, modernised production methods and the move of the company's factory to a larger facility on West 7th Avenue in Vancouver. Forresters slowly expanded the company into the early 60s with the conflict between visions that led the father and son team to sell Purdys to Charles Flavelle and Eric Wilson in 1963. Purdys expanded its presence and product lines in the 60s, 70s and 80s. Initially, after producing only dark chocolate, they began to offer milk chocolate and chocolate, among other products. In 1971, Purdys opened its first store outside British Columbia in Calgary, Alberta. In 1982, Purdys moved its factories and head offices to a new 57,000-square-foot factory on Kingsway and Earles Street. In the early 90s Purdys Chocolatier introduced the hedgehog chocolate line. Karen Flavelle, Com'79, her father's business CEO, Purdy's Chocolatier, never expected to be a premium chocolate company. Early in his career, he asked about working for the Vancouver-based company, but Charles Flavelle didn't want to parachute his children into the company in front of long-term employees. Karen thought she was going to sell the business when she retired. Years later, after working for General Mills and advising a company in the UK called the Product Development Partnership, he was living in Toronto and thinking about his future. He helped her assess her strengths and weaknesses and decide what she wanted to do next. An opening at a midsize retail company jumped off the page, says Karen. I talked to my dad again. I was more thoughtful about why I was interested and felt I could do a good job. This time he was more ready because tragedy had engulfed our family and the death of my younger brother made him realize that he too was mortal and had to think about veraseti. Download MP3 and listen so hire it - a good move for both. Karen has now helmed Purdy's since 1994 and has increased its sales while maintaining purdy's reputation as one of Canada's top chocolate makers, as well as the largest retailer - 64 stores in British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario. Purdy began in Vancouver in 1907 and was taken over by Karen's father in 1963. Many of his loyal clients shared warm family memories of Purdy's ass with Karen. To boost Purdy's success, he launched a number of initiatives, including expanding into Ontario 10 years ago. This company was lore: 'Ontario can't be going berets. It's a long way off,' he says, but this year ontario feels like it's coming to life for us - people are discovering Purdy's. Karen's expansion into Ontario wasn't the first to leave her comfort zone. He chose Queen's because he was interested in reading in a smaller town. He was the only high school graduate to attend a university other than UBC or Simon Fraser University. Karen started at Queen's with a plan to get into international business in French and Spanish. In his first term, he realized that he was more interested in speaking languages than learning the literature of those countries. He made the move for job training for practical practice. The chocolate industry has changed a lot since the Flavelle family took over Purdy's in 1963. Fair trade products are now popular, so Purdy's has begun a program to train African cocoa farmers with better farming techniques to help boost their income. Consumers are much more knowledgeable and sophisticated today, Karen observes. They are interested in where cocoa beans come from, different cocoa beans and the health benefits of chocolate. A company can't last more than 100 years without listening to its customers. Purdys Chocolatier in Kingston, Ontario - Save money and don't miss sales, events, news, coupons.
