Faux nose ring gold

If you're wondering if you can wear a nose ring to a job interview, the answer is yes - but that doesn't mean it will be well received. Tattoos and piercings are commonplace. But when it comes to landing a job, the question is not so much you can wear a nose ring, but it should be worn. It all depends on the situation. Before you make a decision about whether to wear that body piercing, check out the company's dress code. Look at the company's website or, in the case of retail business, stop and see how the other employees are dressed. If a company has a business or professional dress code listed on its website or in its workplace, it's a good sign that your piercing won't be well received. If, on the other hand, the company's dress code is casual, you may have more freedom. However, this still does not mean that you should wear a nasal ring during the interview. More on that later. Another way to assess the suitability of a nose ring during an interview is to do some research on the people you will be interviewing with. Body piercing is usually more accepted among people of younger generations. According to a study published by Pew Research, about 22 percent of Generation X'ers (defined as those born between 1969 and 1982) had piercings somewhere other than the ear, and about 33 percent of those in Gen Next (born in 1983-90) had an ear piercing. Those born before any of these generations tend to have far fewer tattoos, piercings or strange hair colors. This means that if you interview someone who is above a certain age group, wearing a nose ring can be far less accepted than if you are interviewing a younger person. Your workplace is for business, and there's a good chance you'll make other concessions to work there. If you work in a law office or accounting firm, chances are you'll have to wear a suit or other professional clothes - clothes you wouldn't wear when resting around the house. It's a concession. With this in mind, consider your piercing to be another concession. Like a suit, it's something you change in or out of when you go to work. As a general rule, if you do office work or have a professional title, expect your nose ring to be poorly received. If you work in an art studio, café or bar, your nose ring can contribute to the company's alternative vibe. Once you've done some research on company and business, you need to make your decision. Even if the company has adopted the occasional dress code or youthful culture, the interview may not be the time to let your nose ring as the thing that prevents you from getting a job. Piercings and tattoos tend to be polarizing, said professor and author Patrick O'Brien in an article at USA Today College. Some hiring managers may use this small detail as a reason to discount you and other skills, qualifications and training. With this in mind, wear a nose ring only if wearing it is more important to you than getting the job you want. Courtesy It's never too early to start planning your holiday table décor for dinner. Started with brass fitting, cap nut and blue topas stone! used hacksaw and sandpaper to get working sice. Then I put the nut in the handdrill chuck. It made it much better sand and fillet down on a good sice. And I added a little bulge to later stain her in the ring. All I had on hand was a little torch that made it hard to lie down. Because it melted the flow, but until it was hot enough to solder, there was already some oxide as you can see :D Now I've come up with the design. I carved it with my trusty Aliexpress (Dremmel) and made 3 Arms wich later should hold the stone. Unfortunately the material broke on two of them so later I had to remove them completely. Now I've polished the ring again with sandpaper and then multitool. This step should be placing a stone and bending your arms over... now it's sticking a stone in.if you liked this ring you can find a lot more on Instagram: red_headed_makerParticipated in Faux-Real competition
