The journey is the destination meaning

Neither I, nor any other can travel that road for you. you have to travel it on your own . It's not far away. Available. Maybe you've been on it since you were born, and you didn't know it might be everywhere — in water and earth. — Walt Whitman, the leaves of Grasse's journey to achieve my goals far exceed the goal itself. Aside from this, the end result may not be as significant as I lead to belief. Two bold statements, yes, I know. Take a moment to indulge when we explore more if I reflect on a significant goal I've done in the last year. I may have reached the goal of not getting it for steps taken to get there. Reaching the goal is the side product of the trip. Likewise losing weight is inevitable when I implement healthy eating habits and lifestyle changes. The journey to achieve a goal is governed by: the person I become, the skills gained, the connections made and the inner growth that takes place. Target setting is a term that is burned to the human psyche from an early age. The goals represent the cornerstone of every victory I am told, given the crucial foundations to support them. While there is some merit in that consultation, many successful individuals set with few or no goals, yet still fail to achieve significant success. Their underlying motivation is grounded in continuous improvement and acquisition of valuable skills. Today, countless self-help books, blogs and master's classes are dedicated to coaching people in flower regulation. The recommendation to set unrealistic goals, since they are less likely to notice is obvious. It is recommended to outline clear and manageable goals to chart my progress more effectively. Depicted in a quote by Woody Allen there is an understanding of the greater force operating in the background of my life managing more subtle details: if you want to laugh at God, tell him his plans. Here's the message: Life never goes according to plan. Life is filled with what I deddies. It has been confirmed by my enthusiasm for my goal. In light of this message, author Michael Neil emphasizes this point in his book SuperCob: Obsession with goals such as playing a fetching game with yourself is to use your happiness and worth as bones. Success is a journey, not a destination. Performing is often more important than the result. — Arthur Ashe1. Arriving instead of StrivingLife is a series of smaller destinations. The goal in life is not to get things or people to complete me. Such goals are bound to cause suffering when they disappear - easy come, easy to go. When I focus on the goal on my own, I lose the wonderful lessons and experiences that lie in between. My subconscious mind and accompanying biology are shaped in a way to support my success. I appreciate that the journey by I have where to accomplish every job I set my mind to, when my will and intentions land decisively. There is a journey, the mahat in which life exists in all his splendor.2. Take your eyes off prizei time remembered when I set the target for losing weight, with a certain number in mind. The way I used to achieve such a figure was as random as selecting numbers for the weekly lottery. Goals without intermediary processes are meaningless to get me there. Travel is where my goals are formed and realized. I may find that in losing weight, I am gaining certain skills or doing numerous lifestyle changes that I have not previously considered. If I rush the process and achieve my goals in the shortest amount of time, I will outstem experiences along the way that cement my new habits. As I take my eyes off the prize and enjoy the journey, I develop the ability to sharpen the saw as Stephen Covey does in his acclaimed book: 7 Habits of Very Effective People. It is, I learn to maintain and enhance my personal self.3. Travel makes characters formed on the path to achieve my goals. Personality strength developed through trials and lessons experienced during the journey. I call these lessons when I reach my goal, much like an athlete who spent countless hours in training, honing his performance. Those skills will be harnessed at the right time. American writer Helen Keller reminds us of the virtue of the character in the quote: The character cannot be developed easily and calmly. Travel becomes a focal point, since I am likely to gain myriad resources along the way that provide far more rewarding purpose in the end. Successful people are compatible. They know what they want and follow it with extreme determination. They are receptive to the process of life and have no fixed results on how to achieve their goals. Now is a good time as any to get my feet out of the accelerator and slip into cruise control. I trust that I arrive at my destination, as a rewarding journey with the realization of life experiences. More importantly this journey has become a continuous process of refinement, leading me towards my ultimate victory - the success of my goals and the strength of the character to match.
