The kids had just completed a research project on the job they were interested in. It was great to be able to go to classes and talk to them because they've just finished their research. I started by asking them a few questions: Who's ever been on college campus? How many of them have researched a job that requires some kind of education or college? Can everyone go to college? (Many answers were given no.) I ended my interrogation with this: What are the reasons why you think people don't go to college? The answers they got to me included: people can't afford it maybe they're smart enough to have disabilities they don't want Then I talked to them about how affordable college can be. Even Cornell University (which is in our backyard) has a program where if your parents build under a certain amount, they don't have any loan plans. This makes it really affordable for everyone. We also crossed the list not smart enough. Community colleges will accept everyone from the counties they serve. You may be able to get into a certain major right away, but you can take classes that will help you to get there. Disabilities. Some colleges have special programs for students with even significant disabilities. Students may not earn degrees, but they will learn independent life skills and job training skills to help them find jobs. I don't want to. Really this is the only reason for people to attend college. But my hope for them is that they will, and they will help them get back there. From there we played Perp Bingo College I also had them fill out my worksheet a sketch, which I was hanging in the hallway outside my office. Just before that time to leave I spoke to them about this month's Spotlight College (Marist College) and I asked them to write on a note of one thing that they learned with me today. I had them post it on easel located at the classroom door. These are my favorite answers: You can go to college even if you're $enough.
