Omaha Mayor Jean Stotherre unveiled the unveiling on Wednesday. The site gives people a new way to report problems in their neighborhood with an online system and said Stothert will expand the services already provided by the mayor's hotline. Last year, this hotline sent more than 38,000 service requests to city administrations - neighborhood complaints about things like garbage, houses, and permanent angst-igniter: drilling. But all those complaints have been transmitted over the phone now, and the city is bringing the network into battle. Mayor Stother said: We just want as much resources as possible available, easy to use, easy to navigate, that we can have. The important thing about this is to provide updates and feedback to those who have complained. Felicia Russell, who runs a beauty salon and barber shop in Benson, said she hopes the new system will work because it hasn't had much success with others. Graffiti was actually built like three times already. I called and arrived, and I didn't get any comments. They said they would come back to me and that never happened. The mayor said the site would be more efficient and more convenient for customers. It offers continuous feedback to those who, and updates to those who have reported to us. The mayor's hotline staff also takes reports via as well as those called to 402-444-5555 or via email. Felicia says she will wait to see if the new site helps. It will only help if it is effective. If not effective, what is the use in having two lines? The cost of developing the site is $35,000 - paid from the city's general fund. You can also use it to report concerns to Douglas County. Province.
