Deeper definition Issuers use billing addresses and other personal information to authorize new cardholders and send important billing information. Billing addresses and shipping addresses have two distinct functions, though often confusing. Credit card statements or other billing information are sent to your billing address, while online orders, packages and other major materials are sent to your shipping address, often one and the same. If you request or request a new credit card, it will also be sent to your billing address (unless you otherwise request it). Billing addresses can also help prevent identity theft through the address verification system , also known as AVS, as well as the location of postal information related to your account. AVS works by limiting fraudulent charges during the check-out process by comparing the billing address of the card with the shipping address provided at the time of purchase. AVS then sends a code to the merchant that determines whether the addresses match or not. Billing address Example: Tell someone you're stealing your card details and trying to buy your cell phone and ships it to their residence. Ideally, the merchant will notice that the billing address and shipping address of the stolen card do not match (not all merchants use AVS) and reject the transaction and alert the card issuer.
