Cherry creek school district job fair

The term job fair is reminiscent of a large room full of tables of employers waiting to find the right workers to fill open positions. Would-be workers dress up to impress with CVs in hand to try to land that dream job. Job fairs, however, can mean long lines, boring waiting times and disappointment. It is possible to include other activities in job fairs for job seekers, and make the events fun to attend. Jupiterimages/Comstock/Getty Images Serve refreshments. When applicants stand in long lines or spend hours at a job fair, cold water and a snack can bring welcome relief. Food vendors and retailers are usually willing to donate to charity. Offer workshops that improve job search skills. Some applicants may need help resuming writing and interviewing. Schedule group sessions with fake interviews and criticizing resumes. These will be valuable to those who have been out of the job-search arena for several years. Invite a speaker who can motivate applicants. After months of looking for work, many applicants are discouraged and tired. Some give up the search for work altogether. Select a speaker who has overcome difficulties in becoming successful in his or her field; or invite a representative of a large company or industry to serve as a motivational speaker. Get door prizes that make it easier to find work. Solicit donations from companies, such as prepaid gas cards, gift cards, or coupons. A portfolio used for keeping resumes and reference letters tidy is also a useful door prize. Includes a dress for success fashion show. Shops sometimes borrow clothes for fashion shows for a good cause. Recruit volunteers to model clothing suitable for different types of work environments. This will help participants learn the dos and don'ts of dressing for interviews, and what kind of clothing is suitable for different jobs. Enlist the help of hair care professionals to demonstrate the right hair and skin care methods during the dress for success event. School boards are a group of community leaders chosen or appointed by a school district to help establish policies for local schools. Similar to the way a corporate board provides governance and oversight, a school board monitors tax responsibilities and budgets, and helps incorporate a community vision of what students need to know and can do. A primary responsibility of the school board is to ensure the best possible educational experience for all students. This includes analysing curricula and educational programmes and prioritising how money should be In some cases, a school board can decide what can and cannot be taught in certain schools The school board keeps an eye on all money expenditures for the school district. This includes discussing and finalizing budgets for the district each year, monitoring the expenditure activity to ensure that it complies with budget guidelines, budget guidelines, making difficult decisions when austerity is needed. The board also assesses proposals for new construction, school renovations and other large investments in district funds. The board also sees opportunities for the district to generate additional revenue. A secondary task of school boards is to serve as a liaison between the district and the community. Board members should take into account the needs of the district's faculty and staff, parents, students, and others in the general population affected by school activities and financial management. An important part of a board's community relationships work is to hear input from stakeholders at board meetings and address the concerns of teachers, students and community members. The board must also answer local media questions about important issues and liaise with local and state legislators to lobby for concerns about the school district. Ensuring that school district operations comply with local, state and federal laws is another responsibility of a school board. This could include the development of a human resources system that provides fair and objective hiring, promotion and evaluation of school staff. The board also oversees disciplinary hearings related to employee behavior. And while higher quality schools are usually accompanied by higher property taxes, homeowners in such districts are ultimately reimbursed by a higher home sales price. Paying back sounds great, but how much are we talking about? New research from Realtor.com shows that for access to a desirable school district, 9% of buyers say they would pay 11% to 20% over budget. Separately, 17% say they pay extra to be close enough for their children to walk to and from school. Related: 7 Renovation Tips to increase residual valueIn the confrontation between adult facilities and education for children, you guessed it: the kids win. Realtor.com found that 62% of buyers would pass a home spa if it meant being in the right school district. 50% would admit easy access to shopping, while 44% would give up space in the form of a bonus room. If the house you plan to sell is located in a highly coveted school district, do everything in your power to highlight that fact in all your real estate marketing materials. Many potential buyers are the parents of children currently in the school system, so make sure to get the word out among the and local friends. When you buy a home, you use a search feature that lets you filter by school district, because the district's boundaries don't always match city, village, and city lines. After all, you don't assume that your kids will be assigned to attend the same school as the kids down the road or even next door. H. Armstrong Armstrong Images To find the school district associated with a home address in the United States, go to GreatSchools.org and enter the address on the interactive school district and border map. Then find the school district's name to get the district's phone number and call the district to confirm it. After visiting GreatSchools.org to get the name of the district, visit the district's website. Many public school districts have interactive school finder applications that allow families to enter their home address and get a list of corresponding elementary, middle and high schools. At the very least, most have maps with district boundary lines. It is helpful to take this step because school district attendance areas can shift from year to year, so information obtained from neighbors, real estate agents and other local sources may not be accurate. In addition, most ministries of foreign education carry lists of each district in the state organized alphabetically by name, or numerically by district number, and often have maps with boundary lines for each district. Here you will also find district demographics, average test scores, school assessments and other useful information. As a final confirmation step, call the school district office and ask you to speak to an enrollment specialist, who will help find the right school for every child in the family. Not to scare you, but college is going to cost you a lot of money. Okay, so it's not a shock that college and money go hand in hand. And you've probably already accepted that college is going to cost you a lot of money. Hopefully, you've made it a point to look for scholarships, apply for financial help, and find other ways to reduce your college costs. But one thing you should do without a doubt during college is to take advantage of all the amazing resources and opportunities that are available to you alone while you are in college. These perks vary by university, so you need to dig a little. Spend some time on your college's website, attend all orientations when you're new and ask around. Student discounts Whatever you buy, chances are there's a cheaper student rate for it. You can find a student discount on just about everything, such as car insurance, hotels, clothing, computers, entertainment and restaurant meals. Always take your valid student ID with you and don't be afraid to ask: Do you offer a student discount? You'd be surprised at how many places don't necessarily advertise, but indeed offer a student discount. Student discounts will be especially prevalent at companies around your school. Fish around on your college website to see if they offer a list of discounts available to you. Academic advisorsEest. Your advisor is a valuable resource that may end up save you thousands of dollars. Planning your courses may not be as easy as it sounds. If you've been in college for a bit, you know that more often than not, there's a condition you need to take prior to taking another class. Also, some classes can only be offered during certain semesters. If you're planning to graduate in the spring semester, but that a class you needed to graduate is only offered in the fall, you might be stuck staying back an entire semester for that one class. Your advisor can help you plan your courses so you don't take classes you don't need, and you'll take the lessons you do need at the right times. An advisor in your academic department can also help you find valuable resources, such as a tutor if you're struggling, opportunities to contribute if you want to build your resume, internship opportunities, or other opportunities, such as a teaching assistant position. An advisor is also a good source if you are considering doing an internship and would like college credit for it. Many internships legally require you to earn college credit for your work, especially if it is unpaid. Career ServicesIt's never too early in your college trip to visit your career services office. Whether you're looking for a job or preparing for one on the road, this is a great place to start. Here are some of the services often offered in a college careers department: Scoring a part-time job: First of all, they can connect you to part-time jobs available on campus, and they're your go-to place if you're able to participate in work-study. Working on campus has a few big advantages: It's nearby, so commuting isn't an issue and, chances are, the schedule will be because they understand you're a student. Landing a job is a great way to reduce your student loans while you're still in school. In addition, you gain experience, time management skills and build a resume that allows you to find an internship or job. An internship: What does this department offer in the field of internships? They can have an internship job board or put you in touch with different companies looking for interns. Internship and job search assistance: Mock interviews, resume writing help, and guidance on your portfolio are just a few of the services that could make your job or internship search less stressful. Most colleges offer internships and job fairs throughout the year to bring your potential employer to you. Every university is different, so stop going through your career services office as quickly as you do to see how they can help you. Financial Aid CounselorsRegularly visiting your financial department is a high priority throughout the university. Here are some of the things they may be able to help you with: Finding scholarships: Scholarships are free money you don't have to pay Every amount you receive is that much less you are going to owe in student loans. Your financial aid department may be able to tell you about scholarships offered through the college and also point you in the right direction to find more. Applying for financial aid: Even if you don't think you're eligible for aid, submitting the FAFSA and applying for financial aid should be on each student's to-do list. This can determine whether you receive grants (money you don't have to repay), eligibility for work study, and whether you qualify for federal loans. You'll want to opt for these federal loans before turning to a private lender because federal loans often offer lower interest rates, and they are usually eligible for more borrower benefits like student loan forgiveness, income-based payment plans, and suspensions. Understanding your student loans: If you use loans to fund your college education, chances are you have more than one. A key to not racking up a mountain of debt and being able to manage it once you're in repayment, is understanding your loans. If you have questions regarding your loans, this is the place to visit. Personal financial guidance: See what other services your financial assistance department offers. You might find that there are presentations on various personal finance issues, such as budgeting, paying taxes, and learning how to save money. Free entertainmentFor the consequences of where you go to school, chances are there's always something going on around campus. You have the rest of your life to spend money on pricey events and activities. Now is the time, when you probably have limited resources, to take advantage of free and cheap entertainment. Film screenings, art exhibitions, concerts, comedians, plays and musicals on campus, sporting events and guest speakers are just a handful of possibilities. Check out your school's calendar of events online and, as they offer, follow your university's student life department on Facebook and Twitter for regular updates. Study AbroadTraveling is something you do at almost any time in your life, but it will never be the same as studying abroad while at university. Studying in another country is a unique opportunity to immerse yourself in a different culture, create long memories and friendships, experience something completely out of your comfort zone and, as those who study abroad often discover, take the time to figure out where you want to go. In addition to the more emotional and personal benefits of studying abroad, the experience can help you on your CV. Studying abroad shows independence, responsibility and adaptability. You see the world while also turning down credits, and if you do it right, you can end up saving money. Join ClubsClubs and other extracurricular activities are the perfect way to network with like-minded people, and meet both professional and social contacts, and explore an area you are interested in and, hopefully, really enjoy. Getting active on campus is a productive form of free entertainment. Visit the student life department to see which clubs are available to you. Your professors Take the time to get to know teachers who are willing to get to know you. Visit your professor during business hours to ask questions and increase your knowledge. It depends a lot on your professor, but you also have excellent academic and career advice, and possibly even a letter of recommendation or job connection down the road. Your friendsY you don't value friendships you create during college. But besides meeting people you love to hang out with, these relationships may also be beneficial to you in the future. You'd be surprised how the connections you make in classes and around campus could lead to job openings down the road. Ask friends you're classed with to connect on LinkedIn. If you've worked together on a job or on classroom projects, they can write you a recommendation. If you're in your big classes, take a moment to look around. This is a rare opportunity where you are surrounded by colleagues who share the same interests, passions and knowledge. Working with them can be a great experience and a chance to learn new things and let your passion flourish. The LibrarySure, it's a good place to study if your roommate feels extra chatty, but there's a lot more to that library than you think. If possible, once you know which books are needed for your semester, see if they are available in the library. CollegeBoard.org estimates that textbooks can cost you $1,200 per academic year, so consider what you'll save if you could choose the library books instead of buying them. Your library can also offer different search databases that you would otherwise have to pay for, not to mention magazine subscriptions. You also benefit from events such as visiting authors, writing workshops and guest speakers.Computer LabOffer your college a computer lab? If so, this could save you from purchasing a new computer. Even if you're not without your own personal computer, this can save you the cost of a printer and ink or specific software that you may only need for one class. Fitness CenterAt the minimum, a gym membership is going to cost you between $200 and $400 a year, depending on your gym course. So if you have one on campus, take advantage of your university's fitness center. Use the training equipment, join inpatient sports to make new friends, and attend all the lessons they might offer. Your for example, can take lessons on CPR training. This is not only beneficial for you in case you are in an emergency, but if you are going into a Regarding health, child care, or education, this can be a nice gold star on your resume. If your university doesn't have a fitness center, ask around to see if local gyms offer a discounted rate for student memberships. Health ServicesYour college very well may be some kind of health care department. This can give you access to things like free or discounted health care, birth control, or cheaper prescriptions. College is a stressful period in your life, so if you need to speak to a therapist, you might just find one on campus willing to help you for free or for a much cheaper price. The health department can also offer free nutrition counseling, STD screenings, and health calls. Visit your health center to see what they offer students. Students.
