By Fraser Sherman Update June 29, 2018 Most people don't care whether the images they see are works by graphic designers or illustrator. For the person who sees them, there is no real difference. Art experts know they are special fields, although the differences can be subtle. Graphic design focuses primarily on commercial projects while illustration falls more into the art world. The focus of graphic design is commercial. Graphic design is all about visual communication. Their goal is to convey a message, such as buying this product or this company is really great or simply to define a brand. The designer's role is to remain anonymous, step aside and convey the message unheeded. The design itself, though, should command attention. Illustrator, even if they are working on commercial products, there is more about art and images than telling the reader something. Illustrator artists place more on expressing their specific personal styles through their work. Painter Norman Rockwell often paints art with a message, such as President Franklin Roosevelt's depiction of the Four Freedoms, but his personal style is just as important as the message. Because the work of graphic design is communicating, it is very accurate, often combining words and images for absolute clarity. Graphic design with a confusing message is bad design. An illustration with a vague, unclear message can be first-class work. In a book, illustrations can attract attention, but if the reader just flips over them, that doesn't mean the illustrator has failed. If someone skipped a graphic design, the design didn't do its job. For most graphic designers, computers are their painting brushes. They use different design software tools to create their work. An illustrator can work on a computer, but they are only likely to be out and about with a sketchbook, drawing what they see or recording for a later painting. For much of the 20th century, good illustrations were considered superior to good graphic design. Illustrations are pure art, so they are by definition better than commercial tools. In the 21st century, however, the illustration has a much lower status. As the world became increasingly driven by commerce, the messaging capabilities of graphic design grew in importance. These qualities make art illustration more than business also makes it less useful in the market. Artists who make a living by working for commercial clients are more likely to support themselves as graphic designers than illustrator. although a person can work in both fields - a graphic designer can also be a talented illustrator - the skills are not automatically transferred. Giving a graphic design demonstration to an illustrator who knows nothing about design software probably won't work well. By Ashley Donohoe Donohoe March 30, 2018 Graphic Designers use their design, creative, and design software expertise to bring customers' project ideas to life and communicate the intended message. They use their creativity, analytical skills and eyes for design to ensure the project communicates the intended customer message. Since it is important that designers and clients have the same goals for design, strong communication skills are essential to have.
