It has two contrasting sections, different in melody and rhythm. The first section (Yesterday, all my troubles seemed so far ...) opens with an Agreement F (3rd of the agreement is omitted), then moving to Em7 before solving to A7 and then to D-minor. In this respect, the opening rope is a decoy; after the musicologist Alan Pollack points out, the home key (F-major) has little time to settle before the position towards the relative D-minor. He points out that this diversion is a compositional device commonly used by Lennon and McCartney, which he describes as delayed satisfaction. The second section (Why he had to leave I don't know...) is, according to Pollack, less musically surprising on paper than it seems. Starting with Em7, the harmonic progression quickly passes through A-major, D-minor and (closer to F-major) B, before resolving back to F-major, and at the end of this, McCartney holds F while the ropes descend to resolve to the home key to introduce the reaffirmation of the first section before a short hummed closing phrase. The tonic key to the song is F major (although, since McCartney adjusted his guitar one step in the way, he sings the chords as if he were in G), where the song begins before he goes into D minor's key. It is this frequent use of the minor, and the progression of the ii-V7 chord (Em and A7 chords, in this case), leading into it, which gives the song its melancholy aura. The A7 rope is an example of secondary domination, especially a V/vi rope. The G7 rope in the attic is another secondary dominant, in this case a V/V string, but rather than solving it at the expected string, as in the case of A7 to Dm in verse, McCartney instead follows it with the IV string, a B. This movement creates a descending chromatic line of C-B-B-A to accompany the lyrical title.
