Sat essay writing sheet pdf

If you've never written a SAT essay or not received the grade you wanted on your last test, you can benefit from knowing more: both about essays itself and what really matters when grader reads your essay. To introduce you to what you have to do, we've put together these 15 tips to master sat essays. Calling sat essays is a very short task. You only get 50 minutes to read an excerpt of the words 650-750, analyze the devices the author uses to structure his argument, and write a full essay- and it can pass in an instant if you don't have a method to attack it. Writing a SAT essay requires a very specific approach, which is unlike the essay you wrote for an English language class at school. The goal of this strategy is to clamp down on as many desirable components as possible in the 50 minutes you received. In this article, we give you 15 key tips for SAT essays. The first five tips in this article relate to what the college board tells us about what a good essay is. The next five truths that the college board doesn't want you to know (or doesn't make explicit). And the last five tips for SAT essays to write show you how to build SAT essays, step by step. What the college board tells you: The College Board's 5 tips explain the basic components of a successful SAT Essay in its scoring criteria. Here they are, succinctly: #1: Give a clear thesis of the SAT essay the rubric says: The answer includes an accurate central claim. What this means is that your essay needs to make a clear argument that the reader can easily identify. All you have to do to create your exact central claim is to identify the basic idea of the passage and list the methods the author uses to support it. Fortunately, the SAT provides you with the basic idea of passage, so you don't have to go hunting for it yourself. I boldly claim this (fake) examples of clues, so you can see it for yourself: Write an essay in which you explain how Sam Lindsay builds an argument to convince his audience that more works of art should have monsters. In her essay, analyze how Lindsay uses one or more of the features listed in the box above (or features of your own choice) to reinforce the logic and persuasiveness of her argument. Make sure your analysis focuses on the most important features of the passage. Your essay should not explain whether you agree with Lindsay's claims, but rather explain how Lindsay builds an argument to convince her audience. Now, here's an example of a thesis statement for an essay responding to this inquiry: In an article Monster Monsters Everywhere, Sam Lindsay uses personal anecdotes, vivid language, and calls for emotion to convince his audience that more works of art should Monsters. It's good to copy the exact words describing the author's central claim from a clue into your thesis statement – in fact, it ensures that graders will see what your thesis is and on the subject. #2: Include both the introduction and conclusion of the SAT essay heading says: The answer involves a knowly introduction and conclusion. Including entering an item in your essay is absolutely essential to getting a written score above 4 (out of 8). The introductory paragraph introduces the reader to what you will talk about and allows you to create a structure for the rest of the essay. In addition, introduction can be a pretty good quality indicator for the rest of the essay - poorly constructed introduction is often a warning that the essay that follows will be equally discombobulated. It is best to have both input and conclusion, but if you work a short time and can have only one, definitely choose input. The main reason for this is that a good introduction involves your thesis statement. For SAT essays, your thesis (or your exact central claim) should be a statement about which devices the author uses to construct her/his argument. Input can be tricky to write because anything you write in this paragraph can then make you feel like you are locked in writing just about it. If you're struggling with entering an item, leave yourself 10 blank lines at the beginning of the essay and jump into writing your body of paragraphs. Just make sure you remember to go back and write in your introduction to time up! #3: Use effective language and word selection There are several parts of the Writing Score section on the SAT essay topic that refers directly to the style. In 2014, the SAT essay is about an essay with a perfect writing score: The answer is cohesive and demonstrates highly effective use and knowledge of language. For most of us, team language is an area that takes a long time to evolve, so if your language skills are really rough or you're sub-ingated at least a year in advance (or both), you'll probably get more from focusing on other components of the essay. The section sat essay also states: The answer has a wide range of sentence structures. The answer demonstrates the sequential use of precise word selection. The answer supports formal style and objective tone. It basically boils down to: don't be repetitive and don't make grammatical mistakes. In addition, you should avoid using a first-person statement like me or Mine in an essay, along with any other informality. You write the equivalent of school paper, not an opinion piece. Bad (Too informal): I think super convincing Sam in this article is the reason she's just so passionate. It made me feel kind of bad that I wasn't really a monster in my daily life. Good (formal): Lindsay's passionate defense of how drawing monsters allows us to laugh at our personal foibles makes her audience put themselves in her shoes and empathize with her position. Finally, try using different words to describe one idea – don't use the show 15 times. Take the chance to show your dictionary (if, and only if, the dictionary is appropriate and makes sense). This component is the biggest reason why viewing SAT essays is essential – it's quick and easy to change repeated words to others after you're done, but it can slow you down while writing to worry about your word choices. If you are aiming for the highest score, using advanced vocabulary properly is vital. #4: Use only the information from the excerpt All relevant information is in the passage, so avoid being drawn into the subject and using your external knowledge – you want to be sure to show that you have read this passage. In real life, there are many ways to support the dissertation, depending on the topic. But there's one kind of right support on the SAT: specific details are taken from an excerpt you're asked to analyze. We'll show you more below. #5: Focus your essay on relevant details You don't need to mention every detail that makes the argument effective. In fact, your essay will be more coherent and more likely to score higher in analysis if you focus your discussion on several points. It is more important to show that you can select the most important parts of the argument and explain its function that it should be able to identify every compelling device that the author used. Think of it as if you were asked to write a 50-minute essay describing the human face and what each part does. A clear essay will simply focus on the basic features—eyes, nose, and mouth. A less effective essay may also try to discuss the eyebrows, eyebrows, eyebrows, pores of skin, chin splitting, and dimples as well. While all these things are part of the face, it would be hard to elaborate on each of the pieces in just 50 minutes. And this is the eye, and this is a different eye, and this ... other eyes ... and the other eye ... and the other ... Wait... What's going on here? What the college board doesn't tell you: 5 secrets, though sat essays clearly stated publicly available guidelines, are a few secrets to writing an essay that most students don't know and that can give you a big advantage on the test. #1: Read the prompt before the Why passage? Because the request includes a description of the author's claim. Knowing what a claim an author is going into an article can help keep you focused on the argument rather than getting bogged down in reading the passage (especially if the subject is the one that interests you). #2: Your facts must be accurate... But your interpretation Should be a big part of evaluating the analysis for SAT essays is not just identifying the devices that the author uses to create his argument, but explaining the impact that using these devices has on the reader. You don't have to be completely, 100% accurate about the impact the passage has on the reader, because there's no right answer. As long as you see your explanation and give specific examples, you will be fine. Here's an example of the interpretation of what effect a compelling device has on the reader (backed up by evidence from the passage): Lindsay addresses the emotions of her readers by describing forlorn, multi-eyed creatures that reproach her from old-school laptop fields. Readers' sympathy for these forgotten doodles is expertly conveyed to Lindsay herself as she draws a connection between painted monsters and her own life: Often I feel like one of these monster-hidden brushes in my studio who want to create something that no one else cares to see. Now, you don't necessarily know for sure if sympathy for doodle is what the author was going for in her passage. Sat essay grader probably didn't know either (if one of them wrote an excerpt). But as long as you can make a firm case for your interpretation, using facts and quotes from the passage to back it up, you'd be fine. #3: You have to write more than one page This has always been true for SAT essays, but for the first time in history, the College Board actually came out in the official SAT study manual and explicitly said that length really matters. Here's a description of one paragraph, a 120-word-long student response that received a 2/8 date score (bold mine). Due to the brief nature of the response, there is not enough evidence of a written ability to merit a score higher than 1. Overall, this response demonstrates inadequate writing. (source: Official SAT Tutorial, 176) You will have one page for (ungradable) scrap paper that you can use to plan your essay, and four pages of paper writing for an essay – a plan to write at least two pages for your essay. #4: Be objective when reading an excerpt the ability to stay detached while reading an excerpt you will write an essay about can be tricky. This task can be particularly difficult for students who are used to an old SAT essay (which has largely made it a must for you to choose one side or the other). You'll have to practice reading compelling essays and getting objectivity (so you're able to write about how the argument is built, not whether it's good or bad). A good way to practice is to read news articles on topics that you care deeply about people who hold the opposite view of what you're doing. For example, as a composer and violinist/violinist, I could read articles about how children should encouraged to play musical instruments because it has no practical value later in life (a view I disagree with). Then I would work on my objectivity, seduzhing central ideas, the most important details, and how these details relate to the central ideas of the article. Being able to understand the central ideas in the passage and details without being sideways by rage (or other emotions) is the key to writing an effective SAT essay. Always wear © helmet. Used with permission. Don't let monster rage distract you from your goal. #5: Remembering and identifying specific compelling methods Once you can read the articles objectively (as discussed at point #4 above), the next step is to be able to crack the argument essay excerpt. To do this successfully, you need to be aware of some methods that are often used to create arguments. Sat essay tip mentions several of these methods (bold mine): As you read the passage below, consider how Lindsay uses evidence, such as facts or examples, to support claims. arguments for developing ideas and combining claims and evidence. stylistic or compelling elements, such as word choices or calls to emotions, add strength to the ideas expressed. It's definitely possible to wing it and go to the test without knowing the specific names of specific compelling devices and just organically create essays from the features you notice in the article. However, this is a way easier to go into an essay knowing certain methods that you can then scan the passage for. For example, after I noted the central ideas and important details in the article on how more works of art should have monsters, I would then work on analyzing how the author built her argument. Does it use statistics in the article? Personal anecdotes? Appeal to emotions? I discuss the most popular compelling devices that you need to know in more detail in Article 6 of the SAT Essay Examples to respond to each request. How to get all the necessary components in 50 minutes: 5 step by step strategy When you write a SAT essay, You only have 50 minutes to read, analyze and write an essay that means you need a game plan going in. Here's a quick step-by-step guide on how to write an effective SAT essay. #1: Answer the hint Don't just summarize the passage in your essay or identify the compelling devices used by the author, instead, be sure to actually analyze how the author of the passage builds his argument. As the official SAT study says, [Y]our debate should focus on what the author does, why he or she does it, and what impact it is likely to have on readers. The College Board makes a point of pointing this same point in its assessment of the rubric, as well as an essay that rates 2 (of 4) or lower in the analysis simply states rather than explains compelling devices] If you want to get at least 3/4 (or 6/8) in the analysis, you need to prove this warning and stay on the task. #2: Supporting your points with specific evidence from the passage The best way to get a high reading score for your essay is to quote from the passage properly to support your glasses. This shows not only what you read the passage (without having to sum up the passage at all), but also that you understand what the author says and how the author outlines her argument. As an alternative to using direct quotes from the passage, it's also ok to paraphrase some of what you're discussing. If you explain the author's argument in your own words, however, you should be very careful to make sure that the facts you claim are accurate - as opposed to scoring on an old SAT essay, scoring on a new SAT essay takes into account the actual inaccuracies and punishes you for them. #3: Keep Your Essay Organized The SAT essay topic says: The answer demonstrates the deliberate and highly effective progression of ideas both within paragraphs and throughout the essay. The main point to subtract from this is that you have to follow the standard structure for sat essays (body-conclusion introduction). Using the basic structure of a four to five-paragraph essay will keep you organized and make it easier for essay evaluators to follow your considerations – a win-win situation! In addition, you must connect each paragraph to each other through effective transitions. We will provide you with ways to improve efficiency in this area in articles related at the end of this article. #4: Have time to read, analyze, plan, write, and review Make sure you allocate the appropriate amount of time for each of the steps you need to take to write an essay—50 minutes may seem lengthy, but it goes terribly fast with all the things you need to do. Reading a passage, analyzing an argument, planning essays, writing essays, and viewing are important components for writing 8/8/8 essays. For a breakdown of how much time to spend on each of these steps, be sure to check out our article on how to write a SAT essay, step by step. Look after you© 2015-2016 by Samantha Lindsay. Used with permission. #5: Practice The more you practice analysis and writing, the better you get to the task of writing SAT essays (as you work up to it a little at a time). It is especially important to practice analyzing and writing essay components if you are a slow reader (since reading speed can be difficult to change). Being able to quickly analyze and write can help balance the extra time you take on reading and understanding the material. In addition, the time you put into the analysis and writing work will give a greater reward than the time spent trying to increase reading But don't forget: while it's OK to break up the practice at first glance, you also really need to get the practice buckled down and do the whole task in one sitting.
